Article

The Unsettling “Well-Settled” Law of Freedom of Association

JOHN D. INAZU

This Article argues that the Supreme Court’s categories of expressive and intimate association first announced in the 1984 decision, Roberts v. United States Jaycees, are neither well-settled nor defensible. These indefensible categories matter deeply to groups that have sought to maintain an unpopular composition and message in the face of antidiscrimination laws. These groups have been denied associational protections. They have been forced to change their composition—and therefore their message. They no longer exist in the form they once held and desired to maintain.

The Roberts categories of intimate and expressive association are at least partly to blame. These categories set in place a framework in which courts sidestep the hard work of weighing the constitutional values that shape the laws that bind us. This Article exposes the problems inherent in these categories and calls for a meaningful constitutional inquiry into laws impinging upon group autonomy. It suggests that the Court eliminate the categories of intimate and expressive association and turn instead to the right of assembly. Our right to assemble—to form relationships, to gather, to exist as groups of our choosing—is fundamental to liberty and genuine pluralism.
ARTICLE CONTENTS

I. INTRODUCTION .................................................................................................................. 151
II. CATEGORIZING THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION ...................................................... 155
III. INTIMATE ASSOCIATION .............................................................................................. 158
   A. GRISWOLD AND THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION ............................................. 159
   B. KARST’S INTIMATE ASSOCIATION ................................................................. 161
   C. BRENNAN’S INTIMATE ASSOCIATION .............................................................. 165
IV. EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION ............................................................................................ 168
   A. CIVIL RIGHTS AND THE RIGHT TO EXCLUDE .......................................... 168
   B. BRENNAN’S EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION ....................................................... 174
   C. THE PROBLEMS WITH “NONEXPRESSIVE” ASSOCIATION ......................... 176
V. THE COST TO THE JAYCEES ............................................................................................ 181
   A. SIZE, SECLUSION, SELECTIVITY, AND THE SPECTER OF SEGREGATION .......... 182
   B. MONOLITHIC MEANING ...................................................................................... 186
VI. WHY DOCTRINE MATTERS ............................................................................................. 189
   A. THE CHI IOTA COLONY OF ALPHA EPSILON PI ........................................... 190
   B. THE CHRISTIAN LEGAL SOCIETY AT HASTINGS LAW SCHOOL ................ 192
VII. REMEMBERING THE RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY ............................................................ 197
VIII. CONCLUSION .................................................................................................................. 206
The Unsettling “Well-Settled” Law of Freedom of Association

JOHN D. INAZU*

I. INTRODUCTION

The women’s soccer team at the University of North Carolina has won twenty national championships, an achievement unmatched anywhere else in amateur athletics. The LPGA hosts a women’s professional golf tour with nationally televised tournaments and roughly fifty million dollars in annual prize money. Music has thrived (or perhaps suffered, depending on one’s perspective) with all-male groups like the Beatles, the Righteous Brothers, and the Jonas Brothers, and all-female groups like the Pointer Sisters, the Indigo Girls, and the Dixie Chicks. All-black choirs perform gospel music, and the Mormon Tabernacle Choir consists of, well, Mormons. The Talmudical Institute of Upstate New York, the Holy Trinity Orthodox Seminary (Russian Orthodox), and Morehouse College admit only men to their programs; Barnard College, Bryn Mawr College, and Wellesley College admit only women. During the women’s movement in the early twentieth century, women organized around banner meetings, balls, swimming races, potato-sack races, baby shows, meals, pageants, and teatimes.1 Gay organizations “‘have relied on exclusively

1 LINDA LUMSDEN, RAMPANT WOMEN: SUFFRAGISTS AND THE RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY 3 (1997). Lumsden has suggested that “virtually the entire suffrage story can be told through the prism of the right of assembly.” Id. at 144. Iris Marion Young has argued that:

[Female separatism] promoted the empowerment of women through self-organization, the creation of separate and safe spaces where women could share and analyze their experiences, voice their anger, play with and create bonds with one another, and develop new and better institutions and practices.

Most elements of the contemporary women’s movement have been separatist to some degree. Separatists seeking to live as much of their lives as possible in women-only institutions were largely responsible for the creation of the women’s culture that burst forth all over the United States by the mid 1970s, and continues to gay environments in which to feel safe, to build relationships, and to develop political strategy,” including “many exclusively gay social and activity clubs, retreats, vacations, and professional organizations.”

Sometimes discrimination is a good thing.

Of course, discrimination also has its costs. Those excluded—the Salt Lake City atheist with perfect pitch, the male golfer with limited swing velocity but machine-like precision—are denied opportunities, privileges, and relationships they might have otherwise had. They may be harmed economically, socially, and psychologically. When groups exclude based upon characteristics like race, gender, or sexual orientation, the psychological harm of exclusion may also extend well beyond those who have actually sought acceptance to others who share their characteristics. For all of these reasons, there is much to be said for an antidiscrimination norm and the value of equality that underlies it.

But our constitutionalism also includes values other than equality,

2 Brief of Gays & Lesbians for Individual Liberty as Amicus Curiae in Support of Petitioner at 11, Christian Legal Soc’y v. Martinez, 130 S. Ct. 2971 (2010) (No. 08-1371) [hereinafter Brief in Support of Petitioner] (citations omitted) (internal quotation marks omitted). For a history of the early gay rights movement and its reliance on freedom of association, see Dale Carpenter, Expressive Association and Anti-Discrimination Law After Dale: A Tripartite Approach, 85 MINN. L. REV. 1515, 1525–33 (2001). Carpenter notes that “[t]he rise of gay equality and public visibility coincided—not coincidentally, however—with the rise of vigorous protection for First Amendment freedom, especially the freedom of association.” Id. at 1532–33; see also Gay Students Org. of Univ. of N.H. v. Bonner, 509 F.2d 652, 659–60 (1st Cir. 1974) (“Considering the important role that social events can play in individuals’ efforts to associate to further their common beliefs, the prohibition of all social events must be taken to be a substantial abridgement of associational rights, even if assumed to be an indirect one.”); Brief for Petitioner at 30, Martinez, 130 S. Ct. 2971 (No. 08-1371) [hereinafter Brief for Petitioner] (“In an earlier era, public universities frequently attempted to bar gay rights groups from recognized student organization status on account of their supposed encouragement of what was then illegal behavior. The courts made short shrift of those policies.” (citing Gay & Lesbian Student Ass’n v. Gohn, 850 F.2d 361, 366 (8th Cir. 1988))).

3 Matt Zvolinski, Why Not Regulate Private Discrimination?, 43 SAN DIEGO L. REV. 1043, 1052 (2006) (“The feeling of social isolation that results from private discrimination can be psychologically devastating. This is especially true for children, who are particularly prone to question their own self-worth in reaction to discrimination from their peers, but the effects hold for adults as well. Private discrimination can have a tremendous impact on the psychological well-being of even the most self-assured adults.”).
including the value of group autonomy. When these values clash—as they inevitably do whenever antidiscrimination law challenges a group’s right to exclude—we ought to encourage a weighing of these constitutional values rather than a wholesale adoption of one over the other. This is no easy task. Even the polarized ways in which we describe the clash of values points to the inherent conflict and the stakes at issue: what Andrew Koppelman and Tobias Wolff characterize as a “right to discriminate” might also be called “a right to exist.”

The Supreme Court has chosen to address these challenges through the categories of “intimate” and “expressive” association. Koppelman and Wolff have recently intimated that these categories, first announced in the 1984 decision, Roberts v. United States Jaycees, reflect a “well-settled law of freedom of association.” Whether the sixteen years between Roberts and the Court’s 2000 decision in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale established an “ancien regime” is open to question. But the problem with intimate and expressive association is not simply that they are less entrenched than Koppelman and Wolff assert—it is that they are indefensible. Intimate association offers no constitutional protections beyond those afforded by the right of privacy. Expressive association fails

---

4 I have chosen to call attention to the value of group autonomy rather than liberty because group autonomy bears an intrinsic relationship to associational freedom while liberty risks being construed in individualistic ways.

5 The perennial tension between group autonomy and equality is one reason that John Rawls fails to provide a persuasive account of freedom of association in attempting to distinguish between the “basic structure” and the “background society.” John Rawls, A Theory of Justice 6, 79, 386 (1971). For one critique among many of Rawls along these lines, see Nancy L. Rosenblum, Membership and Morals: The Personal Uses of Pluralism in America 53–55 (1998) [hereinafter Rosenblum, Membership and Morals]. Rosenblum concludes that “the morality of association provides a pluralist background culture, much of it incongruent with liberal democracy.” Id. at 55.

7 Cf. Christian Legal Soc’y v. Walker, 453 F.3d 853, 863 (7th Cir. 2006) (“[F]orcing [the Christian Legal Society] to accept as members those who engage in or approve of homosexual conduct would cause the group as it currently identifies itself to cease to exist.”); Richard John Neuhaus, The Naked Public Square: Religion and Democracy in America 142 (1984) (“When an institution that is voluntary in membership cannot define the conditions of belonging, that institution in fact ceases to exist.”).

9 Koppelman & Wolff, supra note 6, at x–xi. I take Koppelman and Wolff’s claim to be that Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000), “capriciously and destructively” disrupted the framework first set in place by Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984). Id. at x–xi. (“Until 2000, . . . [a]ssociations that conveyed messages were entitled to be free of restrictions, including restrictions on their membership practices, that interfered with the dissemination of those messages. Intimate associations of small groups of people had a stronger right, to refuse association with anyone for any reason.”). Koppelman and Wolff may have a broader history in mind. For example, they acknowledge the “germinal case” of the right of association in NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958). Id. at 18–22. But it seems clear that Roberts does most of the work that they want to embrace as the “well-settled law of freedom of association.” Id. at xi.

11 Koppelman & Wolff, supra note 6, at xi.
to account for the expressive potential inherent in all groups.

Intimate association and expressive association are indefensible categories, but they matter deeply. They matter to the Jaycees. They matter to the Chi Iota Colony of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, a now defunct Jewish social group at the College of Staten Island that had sought to limit its membership to men.\textsuperscript{12} They matter to the Christian Legal Society at Hastings Law School, a religious student group denied official recognition because of its desire to limit its membership to Christians who adhered to its moral code, which included a prohibition on homosexual conduct.\textsuperscript{13} Each of these groups sought to maintain an unpopular composition and message in the face of antidiscrimination laws. Each was denied associational protection. Each was forced to change its composition—and therefore its message. Each no longer exists in the form it once held and desired to maintain.

The demise of associational protections is at least partially attributable to the \textit{Roberts} categories of intimate and expressive association. These categories set in place a framework that allows courts to sidestep the hard work of weighing the constitutional values that shape the law that binds us. This Article exposes the problems inherent in these categories and calls for a meaningful constitutional inquiry into laws impinging upon group autonomy. Absent such an inquiry, we are left with antidiscrimination norms unchecked by principles of group autonomy. That conclusion was recently embraced by the Ninth Circuit in denying constitutional protections to a high school bible club that sought to limit its membership to Christians:

\begin{quote}
States have the constitutional authority to enact legislation prohibiting invidious discrimination. . . . [W]e hold that the requirement that members [of a high school bible club] possess a “true desire to . . . grow in a relationship with Jesus Christ” inherently excludes non-Christians . . . , [thus violating] the District’s non-discrimination policies. . . .
\end{quote}

The Ninth’s Circuit’s reasoning is troubling, but it in some ways represents the logical end of the current doctrine of association.

This Article examines the reasoning that has led courts to conclude that a Christian group that excludes non-Christians is for that reason invidiously discriminating. Part II revisits the initial recognition of intimate and expressive association in Roberts. Parts III and IV trace the roots of intimate and expressive association, respectively. Part V details how the application of these categories in Roberts undermined the associational claims of the Jaycees. Part VI uses the Chi Iota and Christian Legal Society cases to illustrate how the Roberts framework continues to damage associational freedom. Finally, Part VII proposes that the Court remedy the problems in Roberts by eliminating the categories of intimate and expressive association. It suggests that we recover a different constitutional right that offers better historical, theoretical, and doctrinal resources for strengthening group autonomy and the possibility of dissent: the right of assembly.15

\textsuperscript{12} Chi Iota Colony of Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity v. City Univ. of N.Y., 502 F.3d 136, 149 (2d Cir. 2007).

II. CATEGORIZING THE RIGHT OF ASSOCIATION

The categories of intimate and expressive association first emerged in Justice Brennan’s 1984 Roberts opinion.16 Brennan announced that the Court had identified two distinct constitutional sources for the right of association.17 One line of decisions protected “intimate association” as “a fundamental element of personal liberty.”18 Another set of decisions guarded “expressive association,” which was “a right to associate for the purpose of engaging in those activities protected by the First Amendment—speech, assembly, petition for the redress of grievances, and the exercise of religion.”19 Brennan contended that intimate and expressive association represented, respectively, the “intrinsic and instrumental features of constitutionally protected association.”20 These differences meant that “the nature and degree of constitutional protection afforded freedom of association may vary depending on the extent to which one or the other aspect of the constitutionally protected liberty is at stake in a given case.”21

Brennan’s arguments implied two corollaries: (1) some associations were “nonintimate,” and (2) some associations were “nonexpressive.” His reasoning thus suggested four possible categories of associations: (1) intimate expressive associations,22 (2) intimate nonexpressive associations,

---

18 Id.
19 Id. at 618.
20 Id.
21 Id.
22 See id. (“The intrinsic and instrumental features of constitutionally protected association may, of course, coincide.”).
(3) nonintimate expressive associations, and (4) nonintimate nonexpressive associations. Since Roberts, it has become clear that there is no constitutionally significant distinction between the first two categories; intimate associations receive the highest level of constitutional protection regardless of whether they are also expressive.23

The same is not true for the distinctions between the other categories. Brennan’s parsing of intrinsic and instrumental value and his reference to the varying “nature and degree of constitutional protection” for intimate and expressive associations signaled a clear privileging of the former over the latter.24 And the category of expressive association drew a line that left nonintimate nonexpressive associations—which would include most of the groups mentioned at the beginning of this Article—without any meaningful constitutional protections.25

The Roberts framework thus created the following hierarchically ordered categories of associations:

A. Intimate Associations
B. Nonintimate Expressive Associations
C. Nonintimate Nonexpressive Associations

It turns out that the groups in B sometimes lose, and the groups in C always lose.

What is more, once a court places a group within either B or C, a... generic appeal to the state’s interest in eradicating discrimination usually trumps the group’s autonomy. In other words, the precise harms that may or may not be caused by the group do not really matter. Following the Supreme Court’s lead in Roberts, most judicial opinions weighing antidiscrimination objectives against group autonomy make little effort to link the specific remedy—forced inclusion in a particular group—to the specific harm—the effects of discrimination by that group in its particular social context.

Consider the Court’s analysis in Roberts itself. Justice Brennan’s opinion appealed to “Minnesota’s compelling interest in eradicating discrimination against its female citizens . . . .” He reasoned that Minnesota furthered that compelling interest by assuring women equal access to the leadership skills, business contacts, and employment promotions offered by the Jaycees. But the national Jaycees already allowed women to join as Associate Individual Members, a status that presumably afforded them many of these business opportunities—the associate status precluded only voting, holding office, and eligibility for national awards, but women could “otherwise participate fully in Jaycee activities.” Moreover, the Minneapolis and St. Paul chapters of the Jaycees had, in violation of the national organization’s policies, accepted women as full members for ten years.

Roberts’s oft-forgotten procedural posture matters here. The litigation began when members of the Minneapolis and St. Paul chapters of the Jaycees brought an administrative enforcement action of the Minnesota Human Rights Act against the national organization after it threatened to 26 Koppelman and Wolff note that while Roberts introduced a “balancing test” when “interference with membership . . . demonstrably interferes with expressive practice,” as a practical matter, “free association claims unrelated to viewpoint discrimination always lost in the Supreme Court under this standard.” KOPPELMAN & WOLFF, supra note 6, at 20.

---

27 Cf. Bernstein, Expressive Association, supra note 24, at 202 (“Following Justice Brennan’s opinion in Roberts, lower federal courts and state supreme courts routinely held that the right of expressive association had to yield to antidiscrimination statutes.”); Richard A. Epstein, The Constitutional Perils of Moderation: The Case of the Boy Scouts, 74 S. CAL. L. REV. 119, 132 (2000) (“One striking feature of both Roberts and Dale is the ease with which these opinions hold that the antidiscrimination principle counts as a compelling state interest that limits the ability of voluntary associations to determine their own membership.”).

28 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 623.

29 Id. at 626.

30 U.S. Jaycees v. McClure, 709 F.2d 1560, 1563 (8th Cir. 1983); cf. Roberts, 468 U.S. at 621 (“[D]espite their inability to vote, hold office, or receive certain awards, women affiliated with the Jaycees attend various meetings, participate in selected projects, and engage in many of the organization’s social functions.”).

31 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 614.

32 MINN. STAT. § 363.03(3) (1982) (specifying that it is an unfair discriminatory practice “[t]o deny any person the full and equal enjoyment of the goods, services, facilities, privileges, advantages, and accommodations of a place of public accommodation because of race, color, creed, religion, disability, national origin or sex”). The federal courts deferred to the Minnesota Supreme Court for the threshold determination of whether the Jaycees fell under the scope of the Act as a “public accommodation.” See Roberts, 468 U.S. at 615–17.
revoke their charters. The national organization responded by suing state officials in federal district court to prevent enforcement of the Act. But the underlying dispute and the immediate effects of the holding of the case were always internal to the Jaycees. For all of these reasons, it is unclear how forcing the national organization to recognize women as full members helped to eradicate gender discrimination in Minnesota by increasing access to the leadership skills, business contacts, and employment promotions offered by the Jaycees. Even if the Minneapolis and St. Paul chapters had denied full membership to women, it seems doubtful that making women eligible for leadership positions or national awards would have advanced Minnesota’s statutory interests significantly beyond the networking and social opportunities already afforded by their limited membership status. Justice Brennan’s Roberts opinion contained no explanation of why this remedy helped to eradicate gender discrimination in these circumstances sufficient to trump the autonomy of this group. And his analysis did not only shortchange the Jaycees. The framework of intimate and expressive association that crystallized in Roberts obscured the need to balance equality against group autonomy more generally, in part because Brennan never adequately articulated the theoretical underpinnings of his two categories of association.

The next two sections will show why the Roberts categories are fundamentally misguided and how they hinder the important value of group autonomy. They explore in more detail the roots of these categories and the theoretical challenges they create. If a coherent theory exists to justify intimate and expressive association, it has yet to be identified.

III. INTIMATE ASSOCIATION

The category of intimate association likely originated in a 1980 article by Kenneth Karst in the Yale Law Journal. Karst’s article, in turn, drew from Justice Douglas’s opinion in Griswold v. Connecticut. This section traces these precursors to intimate association and the ways in which Brennan’s Roberts opinion adopted them.

A. Griswold and the Right of Association

Griswold struck down a Connecticut law that prohibited the use of contraceptives and the giving of medical advice about their use, and specifically the application of this law to the use of contraceptives by married persons.39 Chief Justice Warren assigned the opinion to Douglas. In a draft that he shared only with Brennan, Douglas relied almost entirely on the First Amendment right of association,40 which the Court had first recognized seven years earlier in NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson.41 Douglas argued that while marriage did “not fit precisely any of the categories of First Amendment rights,” it was “a form of association as vital in the life of a man or woman as any other, and perhaps more so.”42 He reasoned that “[w]e would, indeed, have difficulty protecting the intimacies of one’s relations to [the] NAACP and not the intimacies of one’s marriage relation.”43

After reviewing the draft, Brennan urged Douglas to abandon his exclusive reliance on the right of association.44 Brennan argued that marriage did not fall within the kind of association that the Court had recognized for purposes of political advocacy.45 He suggested that Douglas instead analogize the Court’s recognition of the right of association to a similar broadening of privacy into a constitutional right. Because neither privacy nor association could be found in the text of the Constitution, if association could be recognized as a freestanding constitutional right, then so could privacy.46 In Douglas’s memorable formulation: “[The] specific guarantees in the Bill of Rights have penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give

39 Id. at 480, 485.
40 BERNARD SCHWARTZ, THE UNPUBLISHED OPINIONS OF THE WARREN COURT 237 (1985). Douglas’s only mention of privacy in the draft came in the concluding paragraph: “The prospects of police with warrants searching the sacred precincts of marital bedrooms for telltale signs of the use of contraceptives is repulsive to the idea of privacy and association that make up a goodly part of the penumbra of the Constitution and Bill of Rights.” Id. at 236 (quoting Douglas’s draft opinion). Schwartz writes that Douglas’s sole mention of privacy in the last sentence of his draft “is scarcely enough to make it the foundation for any constitutional right of privacy, particularly for the broadside right established by the final Griswold opinion.” Id. at 230.
42 SCHWARTZ, supra note 40, at 235 (quoting Douglas’s draft opinion).
43 Id. at 235.
44 Id. at 237. Brennan argued that Douglas’s expanded view of association would extend First Amendment protection to the Communist Party. Id. at 237–38.
45 Id. at 237.
46 Id. at 238.
them life and substance.”

The connection between association and privacy had been established in the some of the earliest right of association cases. In fact, Justice Harlan’s seminal opinion in NAACP v. Alabama had referred to “the vital relationship between freedom to associate and privacy in one’s associations.” But associational privacy drew from different values than the sense of individual autonomy conveyed by the right “to be let alone.” Privacy in the early right of association cases had more to do with protecting the boundaries of group autonomy. As Harlan had argued in NAACP v. Alabama, “[i]nviolability of privacy in group association may in many circumstances be indispensable to preservation of freedom of association, particularly where a group espouses dissident beliefs.” That kind of privacy did not mean “not public”—in fact, groups like the NAACP and the Communist Party had actively sought public visibility and recognition. It was in this group context that Douglas had first argued for “the need for a pervasive right of privacy against government intrusion” and a “right of privacy implicit in the First Amendment [that] creates an area into which the Government may not enter.”

In Griswold, Douglas linked his earlier understanding of associational privacy to marriage by emphasizing the human relationships common to all associations:

Marriage is a coming together for better or for worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred. It is an association that promotes a way of life, not causes; a harmony in living, not political faiths; a bilateral loyalty, not commercial or social projects. Yet it is an association for as noble a purpose as any involved in our prior decisions.

This relational focus may have drawn an unlikely connection between a married couple and the NAACP, but it resisted the kind individualism

---

48 See Gibson v. Fla. Legislative Investigation Comm., 372 U.S. 539, 560 (1963) (Douglas, J., concurring) (noting restrictions set forth by the Fourteenth Amendment that limit states’ efforts “to investigate people, their ideas, their activities”); Sweezy v. New Hampshire, 354 U.S. 234, 266–67 (1957) (Frankfurter, J., concurring) (acknowledging “the right of a citizen to political privacy, as protected by the Fourteenth Amendment”).
51 NAACP, 357 U.S. at 462.
that equated associational privacy with “the privacy of private life.”

Seven years later, Brennan upended that relational focus in Eisenstadt v. Baird, which extended Griswold’s holding to unmarried persons desiring access to contraception. His majority opinion relied heavily on Griswold, but not on Douglas’s reasoning:

> It is true that in Griswold the right of privacy in question inhered in the marital relationship. Yet the marital couple is not an independent entity with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals each with a separate intellectual and emotional makeup. If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.

Brennan’s language thus converted an understanding of associational freedom rooted in relationships between people to a right of individual autonomy. As H. Jefferson Powell has argued, “Brennan’s reading of Griswold turned Douglas’s reasoning on its head,” and Eisenstadt signaled “the identification of a radically individualistic liberalism as the moral content of American constitutionalism.”

B. Karst’s Intimate Association

Karst’s 1980 article sought to recover the relational emphasis in Griswold that Brennan had abandoned in Eisenstadt. He began by noting that Douglas had focused specifically on the association of marriage. Karst contended that this language had established a freedom of “‘intimate association,’” which he suggested was “a close and familiar personal relationship with another that is in some significant way comparable to a marriage or family relationship.”

---

54 Warren & Brandeis, supra note 50, at 215.
56 Id. at 453 (emphasis omitted).
58 Although Karst’s interpretation of Griswold was more nuanced than Brennan’s opinions in either Eisenstadt or Roberts, Karst’s own liberal individualism prevented him from fully developing Douglas’s non-individualistic arguments about association. See, e.g., Karst, supra note 37, at 626 (footnotes omitted) (“[T]he constitutional freedom of intimate association thus serves as an organizing principle in a number of associational contexts by promoting awareness of the importance of [certain] values to the development of a sense of individuality”); cf. Rogers M. Smith, Beyond Tocqueville, Myrdal, and Hartz: The Multiple Traditions in America, 87 AM. POL. SCI. REV. 549, 549 (1993) (placing Karst in a class of scholars who “still structure their accounts” on the premise that “[i]lliberal, undemocratic beliefs and practices [are] seen only as expressions of ignorance and prejudice, destined to marginality by their lack of rational defenses”).
59 Karst, supra note 37, at 629.
The problem with Karst’s argument is its implicit corollary that some groups are “nonintimate associations,” and that a constitutionally significant line can be drawn between intimate and nonintimate associations. The fundamental critique of both Karst’s argument in this subsection and Brennan’s argument in the following subsection is that they fail on their own terms to provide a defensible rationale for their line-drawing. They fail for the simple reason that all of the values, benefits, and attributes that they assign to intimate associations are equally applicable to many, if not most, nonintimate associations.60

Karst at times recognized the broader applicability of his claims. He noted that “[a]n intimate association, like any group, is more than the sum of its members; it is a new being, a collective individuality with a life of its own.”61 And he wrote that “[o]ne of the points of any freedom of association must be to let people make their own definitions of community.”62 Yet despite these occasional concessions, Karst repeatedly placed special value on the relationships that form intimate associations.

For example, Karst repeatedly emphasized the importance of “close friendship” in intimate association.63 For Karst, it was “plain that the values of intimate association may be realized in friendships involving neither sexual intimacy nor family ties,” and that “[a]ny view of intimate association focused on associational values must therefore include friendship . . . .”64 He also tied intimate association to the kinds of bonds that form through personal interaction: the “chief value in intimate association is the opportunity to satisfy” the “need to love and be loved”,65 “[t]he opportunity to be cared for by another in an intimate association is 60 The one distinction that may have been plausible when Karst wrote in 1980 is no longer true today. Karst claimed that intimate association “implies an expectation of access of one person to another particular person’s physical presence, some opportunity for face-to-face encounter.” Id. at 630. While physical presence may have been a distinguishing characteristic of intimate associations thirty years ago, that is no longer true today. Many people now bridge physical separation and connect in emotionally rich ways with friends and family through online social networking sites, blogs, and video conferencing. Others project their identities or create new ones through virtual representations ranging from simple text (like an online profile) to avatars. Some of these online relationships foster deep feelings of intimacy and connectedness. See, e.g., HOWARD RHEINGOLD, THE VIRTUAL COMMUNITY: HOMESTEADING ON THE ELECTRONIC FRONTIER (revised ed., 2000); Jerry Kang, Cyber-Race, 113 HARV. L. REV. 1130, 1171–72 (2000) (noting that in online forums, “pregnant women share experiences; the elderly console each other after losing loved ones; patients fighting cancer provide information and support; disabled children find friends who do not judge them immediately on their disability; users share stories about drug addiction; and gays and lesbians on the brink of coming out give each other emotional shelter”).

---

61 Karst, supra note 37, at 629 (emphasis added).

62 Id. at 688 (emphasis added).

63 Id. at 629 (“The connecting links that distinguish [an intimate] association from, say, membership in the PTA may take the form of living in the same quarters, or sexual intimacy, or blood ties, or a formal relationship, or some mixtures of these, but in principle the idea of intimate association also includes close friendship, with or without any such links.”).

64 Id. at 629 n.26.

65 Id. at 632.
normally complemented by the opportunity for caring” that requires a “personal commitment”66 “[c]aring for an intimate requires taking the trouble to know him and deal with him as a whole person, not just as the occupant of a role,” which “limits the number of intimate associations any one person can have at any one time, or even in a lifetime.”67

Karst’s attention to friendship and personal bonds is eminently reasonable. But the potential for and the existence of such close friendships can be found in many kinds of associations, including many that would not meet the current legal definition of intimate associations. It may well be that attributes of friendship and personal bonds distinguish small or local groups from large and impersonal groups such as behemoth mailing list organizations. But surely fraternities, student groups, and local chapters of civic associations are capable of producing “close friendships” of the kind that Karst describes.

To be sure, some relationships between members of these groups will be superficial and casual. But this is also true of the relationships that constitute many intimate associations. Karst recognized that protecting the values he saw as inherent in intimate association required offering “some protection to casual associations as well as lasting ones.”68 In fact, “[o]ne reason for extending constitutional protection to casual intimate associations is that they may ripen into durable intimate associations.”69 Karst argued that “[a] doctrinal system extending the freedom of intimate association only to cases of enduring commitment would require intolerable inquiries into subjects that should be kept private, including states of mind.”70 It is hard to understand why these principles would not apply equally to nonintimate associations.

Karst’s other attempts to mark the bounds of intimate association are similarly unavailing:

An intimate association may influence a person’s self-definition not only by what it says to him but also by what it says (or what he thinks it says) to others.71

. . . .

Transient or enduring, chosen or not, our intimate associations profoundly affect our personalities and our senses of self. When they are chosen, they take on

66 Id.
67 Id. at 634–35.
68 Id. at 633.
69 Id.; cf. id. at 688 (“[A]ny constitutional protection of enduring sexual relationships can be effective only if it is extended to the choice to engage in casual ones . . . .”).
70 Id. at 633.
71 Id. at 636.
expressive dimensions as statements defining ourselves.\textsuperscript{72}

\ldots

When two people [voluntarily enter into an intimate association], they express themselves more eloquently, tell us more about who they are and who they hope to be, than they ever could do by wearing armbands or carrying red flags.\textsuperscript{73}

\ldots

First Amendment doctrine cautions us to be sensitive to the need to protect intimate associations that are unconventional or that may offend a majority of the community.\textsuperscript{74}

Each of these claims applies with equal force if we remove the adjective “intimate.” Some associations and associative acts will lack significance for some people, but that is true for both intimate and nonintimate associations. The extent to which expression, self-definition, and unconventional norms unfold in a group’s practices is not contingent upon whether the group is an intimate association.

Some of Karst’s conceptual problems likely arose because he was not explicitly attempting to distinguish intimate from nonintimate associations. He appears to focus on trying to develop a category of intimate association as an alternative to the then-nascent right of privacy,\textsuperscript{75} and to use the right of intimate association to advance legal protections for homosexual relationships.\textsuperscript{76} Today, these particular goals are unlikely to be advanced by the right of intimate association.\textsuperscript{77} We need look no further than

\textsuperscript{72} Id. at 637.
\textsuperscript{73} Id. at 654.
\textsuperscript{74} Id. at 658.
\textsuperscript{75} Karst regarded the freedom of intimate association as on “the cutting edge” of “the current revival of substantive due process.” Id. at 665. In contrast, he believed that “[c]alling the rights in Griswold and Roe rights of privacy invites the rejection of comparable claims on the ground that, after all, they do not rest on any concerns about control over the disclosure of information.” Id. at 664.
\textsuperscript{76} See, e.g., id. at 672 (“[A]s I have argued in connection with the prohibition on homosexual conduct, there is no legitimacy in an effort by the state to advance one view of morals by preventing the expression of another view.”); id. at 682 (“By now it will be obvious that the freedom of intimate association extends to homosexual associations as it does to heterosexual ones.”); id. at 685 (“The chief importance of the freedom of intimate association as an organizing principle in the area of homosexual relationships is that it lets us see how closely homosexual associations resemble marriage and other heterosexual associations.”).
\textsuperscript{77} Toni Massaro has recognized the “problems” with relying on intimate association to advance gay rights: “While a robust freedom of association principle promises greater freedom to gay men and lesbians to choose their companions, it also promises greater freedom to others to choose not to associate with gay men and lesbians.” Toni M. Massaro, Gay Rights, Thick and Thin, 49 STAN. L. REV. 45, 66 (1996). Massaro identifies a risk in gay rights scholars advocating for neutral applications of the right of association: “Unless we aim for an asymmetrical version of freedom of association, or one that is zoned in a manner similar to that of freedom of expression, this call to neutrality, taken alone, may be the riskiest approach of all.” Id. But see Nancy Katherine Marcus, The Freedom of Intimate Association in the Twenty First Century, 16 GEO. MASON U. C.R. L.J. 269, 311–12 (2006) (arguing for a greater role for intimate association in gay rights).

And one from Justice Blackmun that drew upon Griswold’s intimate association arguments and twice cited Karst’s article. Lawrence relied on Stevens’s dissent and never mentioned the right of intimate association.

C. Brennan’s Intimate Association

Brennan’s Roberts opinion never cites Karst’s article, but the intellectual debt is apparent. And while Karst had focused on increasing protections for intimate associations, Brennan’s use of the category of intimate association degraded protections for nonintimate ones.

80 Id. at 216 (Stevens, J., dissenting).

81 Id. at 204–05, 211 (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (citing Karst, supra note 57, at 627, 637).

82 See Lawrence, 539 U.S. at 578 (“Justice Stevens’ analysis, in our view, should have been controlling in Bowers and should control here.”). Nancy Marcus has suggested that “principles of intimate association underlie the Lawrence decision” and that “Lawrence is the first actual affirmation of a litigant’s intimate associational rights by the Supreme Court since Roberts.” Marcus, supra note 77, at 303, 308. Laura Rosenbury and Jennifer Rothman argue similarly that the majority’s “shift from sex acts to relationships aligns Lawrence with the right to intimate association already articulated by the Court in other contexts.” Laura A. Rosenbury and Jennifer E. Rothman, Sex In and Out of Intimacy, 59 Emory L.J. 809, 826 (2010). These claims seem undermined by the lack of any mention of intimate association in the Lawrence opinion, particularly in light of the fact that the Justices had before them Blackmun’s Bowers dissent and arguments about intimate association from the Lawrence Petitioners. See, e.g., Brief of Petitioners, Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003) (No. 02-102), 2003 WL 152352 at *11–12, *15 & n.9 (citing Karst’s article, discussing Roberts’s category of intimate association, and asserting that “[t]he adult couple whose shared life includes sexual intimacy is undoubtedly one of the most important and profound forms of intimate association”); Reply Brief of Petitioners, Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003) (No. 02-102), 2003 WL 1098835 at *5 (“The relationship between two adult heterosexual persons united by sexual intimacy is the very paradigm of an intimate association in which one finds ‘emotional enrichment’ and ‘independently . . . define[s] one’s identity,’ and it is protected as such from ‘unwarranted state interference.’” (quoting Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 618–20 (1984))).

83 The similarities between Karst’s article and Brennan’s opinion have gone relatively unnoticed. Among the few articles making the connection are Marcus, supra note 77, at 278, and Collin O’Connor Udell, Intimate Association: Resurrecting a Hybrid Right, 7 Tex. Women L. J. 231 (1998). Udell suggests that Roberts “lifted the right to intimate association from Karst’s article.” Id. at 232.

84 Post-Roberts cases have made clear that most associations are nonintimate, and few courts have extended the category of intimate association beyond family relationships. See, e.g., FW/PBS, Inc. v. City of Dall., 493 U.S. 215, 237 (1990) (holding that patrons of a motel which limited room rentals to ten hours did not have an intimate relationship protected by the Constitution), overruled on other grounds by City of Littleton v. Z.J. Gifts D-4, L.L.C., 541 U.S. 774 (2004); City of Dall. v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 24 (1989) (holding that dance hall patrons “are not engaged in the sort of ‘intimate human relationships’ referred to in Roberts” that give rise to the protections of intimate association); Bd. of Dirs. of Rotary Int’l v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537, 546 (1987) (holding that the relationship among Rotary Club members is not the type of intimate relationship that merits constitutional protection); Poirier v. Mass. Dep’t of Corr., 558 F.3d 92, 96 (1st Cir. 2009) (refusing to extend protections of intimate association to “the unmarried cohabitation of adults”); Borden v. Sch. Dist. of Twp. of E. Brunswick, 523 F.3d 153, 173 (3d Cir. 2008) (“While the Supreme Court has held that the Constitution protects certain relationships, those protected relationships require a closeness that is not present between a high school football coach and his team.”); Swanson v. City of Bruce, 105 F. App’x began by noting: "[C]ertain kinds of personal bonds have played a critical role in the culture and traditions of the Nation by cultivating and transmitting shared ideals and beliefs; they thereby foster diversity and act as critical buffers between the individual and the power of the State."\(^{85}\) This passage attempts to draw the reader into a kind of Tocquevillean ethos in which intimate associations at once facilitate support for "the Nation" and resistance to "the State."\(^{86}\) But Brennan’s argument lacks coherence and specificity. What is the difference between Nation and State? What are the national culture (singular) and national traditions (plural) brought about by "shared ideals and beliefs"? How do personal bonds "foster diversity" and act as "critical buffers" from state power? More to the point, why are these functions unique to intimate associations? If Brennan’s argument is that intimate associations sustain some kind of shared culture—"cultivating and transmitting shared ideals and beliefs"—then why can’t nonintimate associations also serve as "schools of democracy"?\(^{87}\) Conversely, if he means to position intimate associations as "mediating structures"\(^{88}\) between individuals and the state—"foster[ing] diversity and act[ing] as critical buffers"—then don’t some of the largest—and least intimate—groups have the greatest capacity to resist the state? The passage also belies a more troubling vagueness. It contains an irresolvable tension that doesn’t let the reader know whether Brennan is ultimately prioritizing the state, the non-state group, or the individual, and \(^{540}, \text{542 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The tight fellowship among police officers, precious though it may be, does not include ‘such deep attachments and commitments of thoughts, experiences, and beliefs’ or personal aspects of officers’ lives sufficient to constitute an intimate relationship.” (quoting Roberts, 468 U.S. at 620)); Pi Lambda Phi Fraternity, Inc. v. Univ. of Pittsburgh, 229 F.3d 435, 442 (3d Cir. 2000) (holding that a college fraternity is not an intimate association); Salvation Army v. Dep’t of Cnty. Affairs, 919 F.2d 183, 198 (3d Cir. 1990) (holding that intimate association is unlikely to cover religious groups because “[m]ost religious groups do not exhibit the distinctive attributes the Court has identified as helpful in determining whether the freedom of association is implicated”); Rode v. Delaricpore, 845 F.2d 1195, 1205 (3d Cir. 1988) (holding that a brother-in-law relationship is not protected as an intimate association). But see Anderson v. City of LaVergne, 371 F.3d 879, 882 (6th Cir. 2004) (assuming, for summary judgment purposes, that a dating relationship between two police officers qualified as an intimate association because the two were monogamous, had lived together, and were romantically and sexually involved); Akers v. McGinnis, 352 F.3d 1030, 1039–40 (6th Cir. 2003) (concluding that some types of personal friendships may constitute intimate associations); La. Debating and Literary Ass’n v. City of New Orleans, 42 F.3d 1483, 1497–98 (5th Cir. 1995) (extending the right of “private association” to a private club).

\(^{86}\) The textual tension in some ways replicates the strain between stability and pluralism of mid-twentieth century liberalism and the ways in which scholars like Robert Dahl and David Truman appropriate Tocqueville. See generally Iñánu, Strange Origins, supra note 16.

\(^{87}\) ALEXIS DE TOUCHEVILLE, DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA 511 (Henry Reeve trans. 1899). Indeed, as Nancy Rosenblum has argued: “The onus for cultivating the moral dispositions of liberal democratic citizens falls heavily on voluntary groups such as the Jaycees and their myriad counterparts.” Nancy Rosenblum, Compelled Association: Public Standing, Self-Respect, and the Dynamic of Exclusion, in FREEDOM OF ASSOCIATION 75, 76 (Amy Gutmann ed., 1998) [hereinafter Rosenblum, Compelled Association].

\(^{88}\) PETER L. BERGER & RICHARD JOHN NEUHAUS, TO EMPOWER PEOPLE: FROM STATE TO CIVIL SOCIETY 51–63 (2d ed. 1996).
the answer to that question matters a great deal. From the rest of his opinion and his broader jurisprudence, we might infer that Brennan wants to privilege the individual, then the state, and lastly, the group. But if that is where his argument rests, then some language—“critical buffers,” “traditions,” “shared ideals”—becomes much harder for him to employ in an unqualified sense.

Brennan next enlisted notions of liberty and autonomy in his defense of intimate association, embracing the individualistic gloss that his Eisenstadt opinion had cast on Griswold: “[T]he constitutional shelter afforded [intimate associations] reflects the realization that individuals draw much of their emotional enrichment from close ties with others. Protecting these relationships from unwarranted state interference therefore safeguards the ability independently to define one’s identity that is central to any concept of liberty.”89 These phrases—“emotional enrichment,” “[defining] one’s identity,” and “[the] concept of liberty”—again call to mind lofty ideals, but their meaning are imprecise.90 As before, Brennan fails to explain why his reasoning extends only to intimate associations. People form close ties with others through all kinds of associations. Some lifelong friendships emerge from within nonintimate associations; some intimate associations collapse in a matter of months.91 Self-definition also comes in myriad forms of association—one’s decision to join the ACLU or make a financial contribution to Greenpeace can speak volumes about his or her identity.

Like Karst, Brennan fails to offer a convincing rationale for privileging intimate associations over nonintimate ones. His theoretical anchor is the residue of Eisenstadt that supplants the inherently relational aspects of association with an individualistic notion of privacy. Intimate association is reduced to intimate individualism.92

89 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 619.
90 Cf. Planned Parenthood of Se. Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 851 (1992) (“At the heart of liberty is the right to define one’s own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life.”).
91 Or hours. See, e.g., Britney Spears Sheds Another Husband, N.Y. TIMES, Aug. 1, 2007, at E2 (referencing Spears’s annulment of marriage to her childhood friend, Jason Alexander, fifty-five hours after they wed).
92 The constitutional protections offered by intimate association are today almost completely redundant of those found in the right of privacy. See, e.g., Montgomery v. Stefaniak, 410 F.3d 933, 937 (7th Cir. 2005) (“The freedom of intimate association ‘receives protection as a fundamental element of personal liberty,’ and as such is protected by the due process clauses.” (quoting Roberts, 468 U.S. at 618)); Flaskamp v. Dearborn Pub. Sch., 385 F.3d 935, 942 (6th Cir. 2004) (“Whether called a right to intimate association, or a right to privacy, the point is similar: ‘choices to enter into and maintain certain intimate human relationships must be secured against undue intrusion by the State because of the role of such relationships in safeguarding the individual freedom that is central to our constitutional scheme.’” (quoting Roberts, 468 U.S. at 617–18)); City of Bremerton v. Widell, 51 P.3d 733, 741 (Wash. 2002) (en banc) (“[O]ur cases hold that the right of intimate association stems from the right of privacy, which normally applies only to familial relationships, and ‘extend[s]"
IV. EXPRESSIVE ASSOCIATION

The second category that Brennan announced in Roberts was expressive association. Like intimate association, it has distant echoes of Douglas’s Griswold opinion and the Court’s earliest cases on the right of association.93 But it is shaped even more determinatively by decisions that emerged out of the Civil Rights Era. This section assesses the doctrinal developments in these cases and then examines the ways in which Brennan adopted them in Roberts.

A. Civil Rights and the Right to Exclude

Douglas had argued in Griswold that the right of association “includes the right to express one’s attitudes or philosophies by membership in a group or by affiliation with it or by other lawful means.”94 In other words, as he had asserted in a dissent four years earlier, “[j]oining is one method of expression.”95 Seven years after Griswold, Douglas insisted that the right of association included the right not to associate:

The associational rights which our system honors permit all white, all black, all brown, and all yellow clubs to be formed. They also permit all Catholic, all Jewish, or all agnostic clubs to be established. Government may not tell a man or woman who his or her associates must be. The individual can be as selective as he desires.96

For Douglas, the First Amendment “precludes government from interfering with private clubs or groups.”97

Douglas’s defense of the “right to exclude” came in the midst of the Civil Rights Era when racist white groups repeatedly invoked the right of association in an attempt to curb integration. In Herbert Wechsler’s infamous formulation, “integration force[d] an association upon those for only as far as the principles of substantive due process permit.”98 (quoting Bedford v. Sugarman, 772 P.2d 486, 495 (Wash. 1989)).

93 Karst may have also played a role in shaping the category of expressive association by recasting NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson as a case of “political association.” Karst, supra note 37, at 656–57 n.149 (citing NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958)). Harlan’s opinion in the earlier case had contained no such adjective. In recent decades, the Court appears to have developed a distinct right of “political association” in a line of cases involving closed and semi-closed primaries. E.g., Clingman v. Beaver, 544 U.S. 581, 592 (2005); Tashjian v. Republican Party of Conn., 479 U.S. 208, 217 (1986).

97 Id. at 179; see also Bell v. Maryland, 378 U.S. 226, 313 (1964) (Goldberg, J., concurring) (“Prejudice and bigotry in any form are regrettable, but it is the constitutional right of every person to close his home or club to any person . . . solely on the basis of personal prejudices including race.”).
Whom it [was] unpleasant or repugnant.\textsuperscript{98} Wechsler’s objection made no sense in public settings.\textsuperscript{99} But Charles Black’s response to Wechsler was equally availing. Black argued that the freedom not to associate “exists only at home; in public, we have to associate with anybody who has a right to be there.”\textsuperscript{100} In our society, the boundary between public and private is not, and never has been, the home. People live their private lives outside of the home in religious communities, civic groups, social clubs, and a panoply of other collective enterprises that do not border on “public” in the sense that Black employed the term.

The critical question for the right of association during the Civil Rights Era was the extent to which it could justify private discrimination by whites against African Americans, and the issue was far more complicated than either Wechsler or Black suggested. Three important legal developments provided an answer to this question: (1) the Civil Rights Act of 1964; (2) the Court’s 1968 decision in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co.;\textsuperscript{101} and (3) the Court’s 1976 decision in Runyon v. McCrory.\textsuperscript{102}

Title II of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibited racial discrimination in places of “public accommodation.”\textsuperscript{103} The legislation encompassed inns, restaurants, gas stations, and places of entertainment but exempted private clubs and other establishments “not in fact open to the public.”\textsuperscript{104} Five years later, the Court made clear that sham attempts to meet the private club exception would not prevail.\textsuperscript{105}

The second important development for the right of association during the Civil Rights Era was the Court’s 1968 decision in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer, which interpreted a Reconstruction era statute, the Civil Rights Act of 1866, to bar racial discrimination in the sale or lease of private \textsuperscript{99} Although Wechsler directed part of his critique against Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), it was implausible to argue that segregationists had a freedom to associate (or a right to exclude) in situations where the government provided a public good or service. Cf. Andrew Koppelman, Antidiscrimination Law and Social Equality 179 (1996) (“Wechsler’s objection to Brown is silly with respect to public schools . . . .”).

\textsuperscript{100} Charles L. Black, Jr., The Lawfulness of the Segregation Decisions, 69 Yale L.J. 421, 429 (1960). The exchange between Wechsler and Black is recounted in Koppelman & Wolff, supra note 6, at 17.
\textsuperscript{101} 392 U.S. 409, 444 (1968).
\textsuperscript{102} 427 U.S. 160 (1976).
\textsuperscript{104} 42 U.S.C. § 2000a(b), (c).
\textsuperscript{105} Daniel v. Paul, 395 U.S. 298, 301–02 (1969) (rejecting an amusement park’s contention that it was a private club exempt from the Act because it charged patrons a twenty-five cent “membership” fee and distributed “membership” cards).
The Court reasoned that the 1866 Act reached even private discrimination because “the exclusion of Negroes from white communities” reflected “the badges and incidents of slavery.” It extended the reach of Jones to membership in a community park and playground in Sullivan v. Little Hunting Park, Inc., and a private swimming pool in Tillman v. Wheaton-Haven Recreation Ass’n. Jones, Sullivan, and Tillman all involved sales or leases related to real property covered under the Fair Housing Act of 1968. The Court’s reliance on a somewhat strained interpretation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 rather than a straightforward application of the Fair Housing Act prompted Justice Harlan (joined by Justice White and Chief Justice Burger) to dissent in Sullivan, noting that the “vague and open-ended” construction of section 1982 risked “grave constitutional issues should [that authority] be extended too far into some types of private discrimination.”

These two developments—the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Court’s decision in Jones—represented major steps toward ending segregation. Both also constrained group autonomy. But few people today object to these constraints along racial or any other lines—the idea that owners of businesses open to the public or sellers of private homes should have a constitutional right to discriminate finds few defenders. In other words, if the constraints on group autonomy were limited to these applications, contemporary debates would be virtually nonexistent.

More complicated questions arose from the Court’s line of cases addressing private school segregation that culminated in its 1976 decision in Runyon v. McCrary. These private segregated schools, many of which emerged in the wake of the Court’s integration of public schools, represented a key battleground of the Civil Rights Era. Preliminary challenges focused on government financial support, and in the late 1960s, the Court affirmed a number of decisions enjoining state tuition grants to 106 Jones, 392 U.S. at 444. As George Rutherglen notes, the Court’s interpretive analysis “has proven to be controversial,” but “the extension of the 1866 Act to private discrimination in Jones was both much more acceptable and much less radical” because “the Civil Rights Act of 1964 had legitimized federal regulation of private discrimination.” George Rutherglen, Civil Rights in Private Schools: The Surprising Story of Runyon v. McCrary, in CIVIL RIGHTS STORIES 119 (Myriam E. Gilles & Risa Lauren Goluboff eds., 2008).

---

107 Jones, 392 U.S. at 441–42.

110 42 U.S.C. §§ 3601–3631. In Sullivan, the Court characterized Little Hunting Park’s exclusion of African Americans as “a device functionally comparable to a racially restrictive covenant.” 396 U.S. at 236. In Tillman, a unanimous Court concluded that “[t]he structure and practices of Wheaton-Haven . . . are indistinguishable from those of Little Haven Park.” 410 U.S. at 438.

111 Sullivan, 396 U.S. at 241, 248 (Harlan, J., dissenting).

113 On the emergence of segregated private schools in the late 1960s and early 1970s, see, for example, DAVID NEVIN AND ROBERT E. BILLS, THE SCHOOLS THAT FEAR BUILT: SEGREGATIONIST ACADEMIES IN THE SOUTH (1976).
students attending racially discriminatory private schools. In 1973, the Court concluded in Norwood v. Harrison that state-funded textbook loans to students attending these schools were “not legally distinguishable” from tuition grants. Norwood was the Court’s first explicit consideration of the conflict between anti-discrimination norms and the right of association. Summarizing recent legislative and judicial developments, Chief Justice Burger noted that “although the Constitution does not proscribe private bias, it places no value on discrimination.”

Shortly after Norwood, the Justices addressed the use of public recreational facilities by private segregated schools in Gilmore v. City of Montgomery. Justice Blackmun’s majority opinion noted that in contrast to the relatively easy question of integrating public facilities and programs, “[t]he problem of private group use is much more complex.” The dispositive question was whether the use of public facilities made the government “a joint participant in the challenged activity.” The Court concluded that municipal recreational facilities, including parks, playgrounds, athletic facilities, amphitheaters, museums, and zoos, were sufficiently akin to “generalized governmental services” like traditional state monopolies, such as electricity, water, and police and fire protection. Accordingly, the use of these facilities by private groups that discriminated on the basis of race did not rise to the level of government endorsement of discriminatory practices. But Blackmun went even further, noting that the exclusion of a discriminatory group from public facilities would violate the group’s freedom of association. He asserted that “[t]he freedom to associate applies to the beliefs we share, and to those we consider reprehensible” and “tends to produce the diversity of opinion that oils the machinery of democratic government and insures peaceful, 116 Id. at 463. Burger concluded that simply because “the Constitution may compel toleration of private discrimination in some circumstances does not mean that it requires state support for such discrimination.” Id. Additionally, “even some private discrimination is subject to special remedial legislation in certain circumstances under § 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment . . . .” Id. at 470.

---

118 Id. at 572.
119 Id. at 573 (internal quotation marks omitted).
120 Id. at 574.
121 Blackmun observed that the result might be different if “the city or other governmental entity rations otherwise freely accessible recreational facilities” in a manner suggestive of discriminatory intent. Id.
122 Id. at 575. (quoting Moose Lodge No. 107 v. Irvis, 407 U.S. 163, 179–80 (1972) (Douglas, J., dissenting)).
orderly change.”123  At the same time, he cautioned that “the very exercise of the freedom to associate by some may serve to infringe that freedom for others.  Invidious discrimination takes its own toll on the freedom to associate, and it is not subject to affirmative constitutional protection when it involves state action.”124

Two years later, the Court retreated from both its defense of the right of association and its state action requirement in Runyon, a decision that construed another provision of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 to preclude racial discrimination by “private, commercially operated, nonsectarian schools.”125  Rejecting the suggestion that the legislation “did not reach private acts of racial discrimination,”126 Justice Stewart wrote:

From [the] principle [of the freedom of association] it may be assumed that parents have a First Amendment right to send their children to educational institutions that promote the belief that racial segregation is desirable, and that the children have an equal right to attend such institutions.  But it does not follow that the practice of excluding racial minorities from such institutions is also protected by the same principle.127

Stewart buttressed his argument with a truncated quotation from Norwood.  Burger had written in Norwood that, “although the Constitution does not proscribe private bias, it places no value on discrimination.”128  Stewart’s quotation omitted Burger’s prefatory clause and asserted: “As the Court stated in Norwood[,] . . . the Constitution . . . places no value on discrimination.”129  The abbreviated language stood for a broader legal principle.  Norwood had prevented government subsidization of a disfavored social practice.  Runyon precluded the practice itself and marked the first time that Court had in the interest of antidiscrimination norms denied the right of existence to a private group with neither ties to state action nor meeting the definition of a public accommodation.130

Runyon’s symbolic and substantive importance is beyond challenge.  The decision made clear that the Court understood the Civil Rights Act of 1866 “to reach all intentional racial discrimination, public and private, that interfered with the right to contract,” and that it trumped the right of 123 Gilmore, 417 U.S. at 575.

124 Id.
126 Id. at 173.
127 Id. at 176 (emphasis omitted).
129 Runyon, 427 U.S. at 176 (internal quotation marks omitted).
130 See Rutherglen, supra note 106, at 111 (Runyon “subordinated private choice to civil rights policy and extended federal law beyond the limitations of the state action doctrine”).
association. That core holding has been undisturbed and was, in fact, codified in the Civil Rights Act of 1991. Few people today believe that private schools ought to have a constitutional right to exclude African-Americans, and the decision as a symbolic marker for civil rights and racial integration is indisputable.

Runyon’s doctrinal significance is less clear, and it is on this doctrinal level that the case maintains its greatest significance for contested questions of group autonomy today. Two moves in particular are open to question, and both of them are mirrored eight years later in Roberts’s much different context. The first is the argument that forced inclusion of unwanted members does not change the core expression of a discriminatory group. Justice Stewart quoted with approval the Fourth Circuit’s conclusion that “‘there is no showing that discontinuance of [the] discriminatory admission practices would inhibit in any way the teaching in these schools of any ideas or dogma.’” If we set aside the political and moral context of Runyon and examine the argument on its own terms, it is implausible to claim that forcing a school to abandon its racially discriminatory admissions policy would not inhibit its teaching of racist ideas and dogma. The United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit made a related observation about the message conveyed by a group’s very existence in upholding the associational rights of a gay student group:

[B]eyond the specific communications at [its] events is the 132 See Rutherglen, supra note 106, at 111, 122 (noting that in Patterson v. McLean Credit Union, 491 U.S. 164, 171–75 (1989), the Court decided against overruling Runyon and that Patterson was superseded by the Civil Rights Act of 1991, “which amended section 1981 to make clear that it covered all aspects of contractual relations and applied to all contracts”).

133 Runyon, 427 U.S. at 176 (quoting McCrary v. Runyon, 515 F.2d 1082, 1087 (4th Cir. 1975)).
134 See KOPPELMAN & WOLFF, supra note 6, at 19 (“If the schools are integrated, it is hard to imagine that this will not have some effect on the ideas taught.”); William Buss, Discrimination by Private Clubs, 67 WASH. U. L.Q. 815, 831 (1989) (“[T]he assertion that forcing a school to admit black children will ‘in no way’ inhibit the school’s intended message that racial integration is bad proves too much to swallow. Just as government-mandated school segregation conveys a powerful message that black people are unworthy to associate with whites, state-mandated integration conveys a powerful message that blacks and whites are human beings with equal worth and dignity. That message must blunt any merely verbal message, taught in the school, that segregation is a good thing.” (footnote omitted)). Some scholars have nevertheless left Stewart’s reasoning here unchallenged, arguing instead that the defendants in Runyon never contended that they should be protected as “expressive associations,” notwithstanding the fact that the Court had yet to recognize such a category. See, e.g., David E. Bernstein, The Right of Expressive Association and Private Universities’ Racial Preferences and Speech Codes, 9 WM. & MARY BILL Rts. J. 619, 626–27 (2001) (“[A] close reading of Runyon and the briefs filed in it reveal that Runyon was not an ‘expressive association’ case. The defendants in Runyon made what amounts to a short, throw-away argument that their right to ‘freedom of association,’ floating somewhere in the penumbral ether of the Constitution, was violated by compelled integration. However, the defendants did not make an expressive association claim grounded in the First Amendment. They did not argue in their briefs that the school’s ability to promote segregation would be compromised, nor did they provide evidence at trial on that issue.”).
basic “message” [Gay Students Organization] seeks to convey—that homosexuals exist, that they feel repressed by existing laws and attitudes, that they wish to emerge from their isolation, and that public understanding of their attitudes and problems is desirable for society.\textsuperscript{135}

Stewart’s second questionable doctrinal move was his distinction between the act of discrimination and the message of discrimination. In Stewart’s view, the right of association protected only the latter, and the exclusion of African Americans counted only as the former. In other words, the right of association only extended to the expression of ideas, and exclusion wasn’t expression. But that argument makes an arbitrary distinction between act and message that could be applied to any form of symbolic expression. It tells us nothing about the value or harm of the expression itself.\textsuperscript{136}

B. Brennan’s Expressive Association

Brennan’s Roberts opinion characterized expressive association as “for the purpose of engaging in those activities protected by the First Amendment—speech, assembly, petition for the redress of grievances, and the exercise of religion.”\textsuperscript{137} The Court had “long understood as implicit in the right to engage in activities protected by the First Amendment a corresponding right to associate with others in pursuit of a wide variety of political, social, economic, educational, religious, and cultural ends.”\textsuperscript{138}

\textsuperscript{135} Gay Students Org. of the Univ. of N.H. v. Bonner, 509 F.2d 652, 661 (1st Cir. 1974).

\textsuperscript{136} Stewart soon reiterated this narrower understanding of the right of association in cases beyond the Civil Rights context. Writing for the majority in Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, a 1977 case involving an “agency shop” arrangement for state government employees, he described “the freedom of an individual to associate for the purpose of advancing beliefs and ideas.” 431 U.S. 209, 233 (1977) (emphasis added). And four years later, writing for the Court in Democratic Party of the United States v. Wisconsin, a case involving political parties, Stewart referred to the “freedom to gather in association for the purpose of advancing shared beliefs.” 450 U.S. 107, 121 (1981) (emphasis added). That same year, Burger echoed Stewart’s view in Citizens Against Rent Control v. Berkeley. 454 U.S. 290 (1981) (emphasis added). Although acknowledging that “the practice of persons sharing common views banding together to achieve a common end is deeply embedded in the American political process,” Burger asserted that the real value of association was “that by collective effort individuals can make their views known, when, individually, their voices would be faint or lost.” Id. at 294 (emphasis added). Three years later, Brennan adopted Stewart’s distinction between belief and practice and rendered association wholly instrumental to other First Amendment freedoms. Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 618 (1984).

\textsuperscript{137} Roberts, 468 U.S. at 618.

\textsuperscript{138} Id. at 622. Lower courts have generally adopted Brennan’s instrumental gloss on expressive association. See, e.g., Schultz v. Wilson, 304 F. App’x 116, 120 (3d Cir. 2008) (“A social group is not protected unless it engages in expressive activity such as taking a stance on an issue of public, political, social, or cultural importance.”); Willis v. Town of Marshall, 426 F.3d 251, 261 (4th Cir. 2005) (“[A] constitutionally protected right to associate depends upon the existence of an activity that is itself protected by the First Amendment.”); Wine & Spirits Retailers, Inc. v. Rhode Island, 418 F.3d 36, 50 (1st Cir. 2005) (“[I]n a free speech case, an association’s expressive purpose may pertain to a wide array of ends (including economic ends), but the embedded associational right protects only collective...
Despite his instrumental characterization of expressive association, Brennan proposed an ostensibly protective legal test: “Infringements on [the right of expressive association] may be justified by regulations adopted to serve compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas, that cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms.”

The language of “compelling state interests, unrelated to the suppression of ideas” calls to mind the strict scrutiny standard established in other areas of the Court’s First Amendment law. But the reference to “means significantly less restrictive” differs from the usual strict scrutiny language of “least restrictive means.” On closer examination, what resembles a strict scrutiny test might actually invert the presumption favoring the protected First Amendment activity to one that favors the government. Brennan’s phrasing suggests that a government regulation that is to a large extent—but not significantly more—restrictive of associational freedoms than a less onerous regulation would survive the test. Although Brennan elsewhere intimated that he was applying strict speech and expressive conduct in pursuit of those ends; it does not cover concerted action that lacks an expressive purpose.” (internal citations omitted); McCabe v. Sharrett, 12 F.3d 1558, 1563 (11th Cir. 1994) (“The right of expressive association . . . is protected by the First Amendment as a necessary corollary of the rights that the amendment protects by its terms. . . . [A] plaintiff . . . can obtain special protection for an asserted associational right if she can demonstrate . . . that the purpose of the association is to engage in activities independently protected by the First Amendment.” (internal citations omitted)); Salvation Army v. Dep’t of Cmty. Affairs, 919 F.2d 183, 199 (3d Cir. 1990) (“The Supreme Court has not yet defined the parameters of the right to associate for religious purposes, but it has made it clear that the right to expressive association is a derivative right, which has been implied from the First Amendment in order to assure that those rights expressly secured by that amendment can be meaningfully exercised. Thus, there is no constitutional right to associate for a purpose that is not protected by the First Amendment.” (internal citations omitted)). But see Deja Vu of Nashville, Inc. v. Metro. Gov’t of Nashville & Davidson Cnty., 274 F.3d 377, 396 (6th Cir. 2002) (finding that the First Amendment “protects the entertainers and audience members’ right to free expressive association” at an adult establishment because “[t]hey are certainly engaged in a collective effort on behalf of shared goals” and “[t]he dancers and customers work together as speaker and audience to create an erotic, sexually-charged atmosphere, and although society may not find that a particularly worthy goal, it is a shared one nonetheless”).

139 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 623. Brennan also emphasized that “[t]here can be no clearer example of an intrusion into the internal structure or affairs of an association than a regulation that forces the group to accept members it does not desire.” Id.

140 The most commonly asserted elements of the test require that a statute subject to strict scrutiny must be narrowly tailored and use the least restrictive means to further a compelling government interest. See, e.g., United States v. Playboy Emt’n Group, Inc., 529 U.S. 803, 813 (2000) (summarizing the strict scrutiny test); Sable Commc’ns of Cal., Inc. v. Fed. Commc’ns Comm’n, 492 U.S. 115, 126 (1989) (finding that protecting the psychological and physical wellbeing of minors is a compelling government interest, but that the government must still choose the least restrictive means to further said interest); First Nat’l Bank of Bos. v. Bellotti, 435 U. S. 765, 786 (1978) (noting that a state-imposed restriction on corporate speech cannot stand in the absence of a compelling state interest).

scrutiny, his only formulation of the legal test proposed a different standard, and, unsurprisingly, some courts have construed Roberts as intending something less than strict scrutiny.

C. The Problems with “Nonexpressive” Association

Brennan’s rendering of the constitutional test for regulations impinging upon expressive association was not the only problem with his analysis. His category of expressive association implied that some associations were “nonexpressive.” The problems with this line-drawing are not merely doctrinal—they are philosophical as well. The purported distinction between expressive and nonexpressive association fails to recognize that: (1) all associations have expressive potential; (2) meaning is dynamic; and (3) meaning is subject to more than one interpretation. These three claims rely on hermeneutical arguments whose full consideration exceeds the scope of this Article and which are addressed here in summary fashion.

---

142 See Roberts, 468 U.S. at 626 (noting that the state achieved its interest through “the least restrictive means”); id. at 628 (finding that the “incidental abridgment” of protected speech “[was] not greater than [was] necessary”). Four Justices later equated the Roberts test of “means significantly less restrictive” to strict scrutiny. See Dale, 530 U.S. at 680 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (finding that eliminating discrimination is a compelling government interest, and observing that the court in Roberts “held that Minnesota’s law [was] the least restrictive means of achieving [the state’s compelling] interest”). Justices Souter, Ginsburg, and Breyer joined Justice Stevens’s dissent. Id. at 663. But in some ways, Dale only adds to the ambiguity of the test the Court applies in freedom of association cases. See id. at 658–59 (rejecting “the intermediate standard of review enunciated in United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968),” but noting that under the proper analysis, “the associational interest in freedom of expression has been set on one side of the scale, and the State’s interest on the other”).

143 See, e.g., Tabba v. Chertoff, 509 F.3d 89, 105 (2d Cir. 2007) (“Roberts does not require the government to exhaust every possible means of furthering its interest; rather, the government must show only that its interest ‘cannot be achieved through means significantly less restrictive of associational freedoms.’” (emphasis added) (quoting Roberts, 468 U.S. at 623)); Chi Iota Colony of Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity v. City Univ. of N.Y., 502 F.3d 136, 139 (2d Cir. 2007) (“The mere fact that the associational interest asserted is recognized by the First Amendment does not necessarily mean that a regulation which burdens that interest must satisfy strict scrutiny.”); Hatcher v. Bd. of Pub. Educ., 809 F.2d 1546, 1559 n.26 (11th Cir. 1987) (describing a “balancing of interests” (quoting Roberts, 468 U.S. at 623)); Every Nation Campus Ministries v. Achtenberg, 597 F. Supp. 2d 1075, 1083 (S.D. Cal. 2009) (“[S]tate action that burdens a group’s ability to engage in expressive association [need not] always be subject to strict scrutiny, even if the group seeks to engage in expressive association through a limited public forum.”) (quoting Truth v. Kent Sch. Dist., 542 F.3d 634, 652 (9th Cir. 2008) (Fisher, J., concurring))); cf. Forum for Academic & Institutional Rights v. Rumsfeld, 390 F.3d 219, 247 (3d. Cir. 2004) (Aldisert, J., dissenting) (describing Roberts as having announced a “balance-of-interests test”).

144 Justice O’Connor’s concurrence explicitly refers to “nonexpressive association.” See Roberts, 468 U.S. at 638 (O’Connor, J., concurring) (“[T]his Court’s case law recognizes radically different constitutional protections for expressive and nonexpressive associations.”).

145 Cf. Epstein, supra note 27, at 122 (arguing that the distinction between expressive and nonexpressive association “is indefensible both as a matter of political theory and constitutional law”).

146 For the kind of argument on which these claims are based, see generally LUDWIG WITTGENSTEIN, PHILOSOPHICAL INVESTIGATIONS (G.E.M. Anscombe trans., Basil Blackwell & Mott, Ltd. 3d ed. 1958) (1953).
1. The Ubiquity of Expressive Association

The first problem with “nonexpressive association” is that every association—and every associational act—has expressive potential. Expressive meaning comes through the performance of communal acts, and communicative possibility exists in joining, excluding, gathering, proclaiming, engaging, or not engaging. Once an association is stipulated between two or more people, almost any associational act by those people—when consciously undertaken as members of the association—has expressive potential reflective of that association.

Erwin Chemerinsky and Catherine Fisk reject this capacious understanding of expressive meaning in their consideration of Dale. For example, they assert that “[t]he membership of an association is not inherently expressive in the way that the membership of a parade is . . . .” But this is not always the case—membership in the Ku Klux Klan likely conveys greater expressivism than marching in the Macy’s Thanksgiving Day Parade.

Chemerinsky and Fisk make a related error when they propose a speech–based remedy for the Boy Scouts in a world in which the Court had decided Dale differently. They argue that even if the Scouts had been forced to include James Dale as part of its association,

> [it] easily could proclaim to the world that it is anti-gay and that it was accepting gay scoutleaders, like James Dale, because the law required it to do so. In other words, the Boy Scouts could use the forced inclusion of homosexuals as the occasion for making clear its anti-gay message, and that the inclusion of Dale was a result of legal compulsion and not a

---

147 Cf. Roberts, 468 U.S. at 636 (O’Connor, J., concurring) (“Even the training of outdoor survival skills or participation in community service might become expressive when the activity is intended to develop good morals, reverence, patriotism, and a desire for self-improvement.”).

148 The claim is intentionally broad—it is difficult to envision any associative act that lacks expressive potential. William Marshall posits a counterexample: “Tom and Fred walking down the street is, in no meaningful sense, expression.” Marshall, supra note 36, at 77. But as long as Tom and Fred’s stroll reflects a conscious decision to walk with one another, then the act of walking may express a kind of shared (though perhaps fleeting) affiliation. The meaning of that expression will vary based upon the surrounding circumstances. Consider, for example, the expressive meaning if Tom is black and Fred is white and they are walking merrily down the main street of a small southern town in the 1950s.

151 Cf. Chemerinsky & Fisk, supra note 149, at 599 (“[T]he Klan likely could exclude African Americans or the Nazi party could exclude Jews because discrimination is a key aspect of their message.”).
matter of condoning his sexual orientation.152

Chemerinsky and Fisk’s proposal assumes that policy statements made by the Boy Scouts will perfectly mitigate the direct and indirect expressive effects of Dale’s forced inclusion. But once we recognize that expressive meaning extends beyond words, there is no guarantee that words alone will restore an expressive equilibrium. For example, the Scouts might be forced to adjust their policy statement about homosexuality in a way that is suboptimal to their associational purposes and beliefs. It is also possible that the Scouts could believe that no words or statements would adequately disavow the symbolic meaning of Dale’s forced inclusion in their group.

To illustrate further why the category of expressive association fails to encompass the broader understanding of meaning suggested in this Article, consider a gay social club.153 Suppose that the club has twenty members, placing it well outside of the currently recognized contours of an intimate association. Suppose further that the club’s members engage in no verbal or written expression directed outside of their gatherings but make no effort to conceal their membership from their friends, colleagues, and acquaintances who are not part of the club. There is no way that the members of this club are engaging in “a right to associate for the purpose of engaging in those activities protected by the First Amendment—speech, assembly, petition for the redress of grievances, and the exercise of religion.”154 And yet there is clearly an expressive message in their very act of gathering.155

2. Meaning Is Dynamic

The second problem with the reasoning underlying expressive association is that meaning is dynamic. The messages, creeds, practices, and even the central purposes of associations change over time. Justice Souter missed this reality when he argued in his Dale dissent that “no group can claim a right of expressive association without identifying a clear position to be advocated over time in an unequivocal way.”156 That standard proves too much. What would it mean for a group to advocate a “clear position” “over time” in “an unequivocal way”?157

3. Meaning Is Subject to More than One Interpretation

The final problem with the idea of expressive association is that meaning is subject to more than one interpretive gloss.158 Acknowledging the subjective interpretation of meaning exposes a related problem inherent in the “message-based” approach of the expressive association doctrine: who decides what counts as the message of the group? Chemerinsky and Fisk criticize the Supreme Court in Dale for unduly deferring to the Boy Scouts’ leadership’s views about the group’s expressive message.159 But there is not a readily apparent alternative that more “justly” or “accurately” captures the group’s expressive meaning. For example, it is not obvious that a majority of the group’s members should be recognized as having the authoritative interpretation of the group’s meaning, particularly for 157 Even “[t]he ‘message’ conveyed by a monument may change over time.” Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, 129 S. Ct. 1125, 1136 (2009). The character of an organization or association may likewise change over time:

[The] line between commercial associations and political organizations is not easily drawn, nor can one predict when a commercial association will metamorphose into an important expressive association. For example, America’s most powerful lobbying organization, the American Association of Retired Persons, began as a commercial association organized to sell health care products to the elderly, and still has substantial business interests.

158 Cf. ROSENBLUM, MEMBERSHIP AND MORALS, supra note 5, at 6 (“There are always alternative understandings of an association’s nature and purpose, and competing classifications.”). Justice Alito recently made a similar observation about monuments:

Even when a monument features the written word, the monument may be intended to be interpreted, and may in fact be interpreted by different observers, in a variety of ways. . . . . . [T]ext-based monuments are almost certain to evoke different thoughts and sentiments in the minds of different observers, and the effect of monuments that do not contain text is likely to be even more variable.

Summum, 129 S. Ct. at 1135.

At least three of the other Dale justices appear to share Souter’s view. Justices Ginsburg and Breyer joined Souter’s dissent. 530 U.S. at 702. Justice Stevens made a similar claim in his dissent. Id. at 685 (Stevens, J., dissenting) (“Equally important is BSA’s failure to adopt any clear position on homosexuality. BSA’s temporary, though ultimately abandoned, view that homosexuality is incompatible with being ‘morally straight’ and ‘clean’ is a far cry from the clear, unequivocal statement necessary to prevail on its claim.”).

159 See Chemerinsky & Fisk, supra note 149, at 600 (arguing that the Court’s holdings in Dale “will allow any group that wants to discriminate to do so by claiming . . . a desire to exclude based on any characteristics that it chooses”).
hierarchically structured groups.\textsuperscript{160} And as Andrew Koppelman has suggested, “it is unseemly, and potentially abusive, for courts to tell organizations—particularly organizations with dissenting political views—what their positions are.”\textsuperscript{161}

The challenges to determining a group’s meaning get even thornier. Consider three different characterizations that Chemerinsky and Fisk offer about the purposes of the Boy Scouts: (1) a “significant number of current and former scouts . . . reasonably believed that scouting was, and should be, about camping”,\textsuperscript{162} (2) all members of the Boy Scouts understand that “the Boy Scouts is for boys,” and “[a]ll presumably believe that same sex experiences offer valuable developmental opportunities for children”,\textsuperscript{163} and (3) “we suspect [that] Boy Scouts of America is understood [by its members] to be about honesty, self-reliance, service, leadership, and camping.”\textsuperscript{164} These descriptions are not interchangeable. They assign different purposes to the Boy Scouts (camping vs. gender-based activities vs. camping plus other things), they attribute those purposes to different subsets of the association (a significant number of current and former scouts vs. all members vs. members), and they attach varying degrees of certainty to the asserted meaning (the belief was “reasonable” vs. all members “presumably believed” vs. the belief is something that Chemerinsky and Fisk “suspect”). All of these variations and their varying rhetorical emphases spring from the description of a single association in a single law review article. It is not hard to see how the interpretive dilemmas multiply when assertions of purpose and meaning are expanded ever further. These interminable inquiries into what counts as the expressive message of a group are artificially imposed by the artificial distinction between expressive and nonexpressive associations.

4. The Limits of Expression

Once we acknowledge the multivalent expression inherent in group activity, we can no longer easily label some groups as “nonexpressive.” It might be argued that this claim runs afoul of basic First Amendment doctrine. For example, in United States v. O’Brien, the seminal case on symbolic speech, the Court rejected “the view that an apparently limitless variety of conduct can be labeled ‘speech’ whenever the person engaging \textsuperscript{160} For examples of groups whose meaning and message are not determined by majority vote, see U.S. CONST. art. II, § 2 (“The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States . . .”), Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 613 (1984) (“The ultimate policymaking authority of the Jaycees rests with an annual national convention, consisting of delegates from each local chapter, with a national president and board of directors,” instead of by a majority vote of the entire membership).

\textsuperscript{161} KOPPELMAN & WOLFF, supra note 6, at 24.

\textsuperscript{162} Chemerinsky & Fisk, supra note 149, at 608.

\textsuperscript{163} Id. at 609.

\textsuperscript{164} Id. at 611.
in the conduct intends thereby to express an idea.”\(^{165}\) But the Court has itself undermined this distinction with its expansive embrace of the concept of symbolic speech, and interpreting O’Brien’s parsing of speech and conduct too mechanically is “doomed to failure.”\(^{166}\) All that the purported definitional limitation on “speech” means is that some conduct can be regulated based upon its content or harm irrespective of whether it has an expressive component.\(^{167}\) Thus, the Court acknowledges the expressive dimensions of dancing naked\(^{168}\) and sleeping in a park\(^{169}\) even as it endorses the government’s proscription of those activities. Of course, as these examples illustrate, not every expressive act warrants constitutional protection: defining what constitutes expression differs from determining the scope of legal protection. Recognizing the expressive potential of associations tells us nothing about whether they will be constitutionally protected. But it prevents those who exercise coercive power over our lives from avoiding a meaningful weighing of constitutional values simply by classifying some groups as “nonexpressive.”\(^{170}\)

V. THE COST TO THE JAYCEES

The preceding two sections have traced the developments leading to the Court’s recognition of the categories of intimate and expressive association in Roberts and identified the problems with these categories. This section explores how the Court’s use of intimate and expressive association in Roberts illegitimately rejected the associational claims of the \(^{167}\) Cf. R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377, 383 (1992) (“We have sometimes said that [certain] categories of expression are ‘not within the area of constitutionally protected speech,’ or that the ‘protection of the First Amendment does not extend’ to them. Such statements must be taken in context, however, and are no more literally true than is the occasionally repeated shorthand characterizing obscenity ‘as not being speech at all.’ What they mean is that these areas of speech can, consistently with the First Amendment, be regulated because of their constitutionally proscribable content (obscenity, defamation, etc.)—not that they are categories of speech entirely invisible to the Constitution . . . .” (internal citations omitted)).

---

\(^{168}\) See Barnes v. Glen Theatre, Inc., 501 U.S. 560, 566 (1991) (“[N]ude dancing of the kind sought to be performed here is expressive conduct within the outer perimeters of the First Amendment, though we view it as only marginally so.”).

\(^{170}\) The Supreme Court occasionally evades this distinction. See Rumsfeld v. Forum for Academic & Institutional Rights, 547 U.S. 47, 66 (2006) (claiming that “we have extended First Amendment protection only to conduct that is inherently expressive”). Commenting upon this sentence in FAIR, Dale Carpenter rightly notes that the Court “cites no precedent for this conclusion or for the phrase ‘inherently expressive.’ No prior majority opinion on the subject has suggested that in deciding whether conduct is expressive we should look only at the conduct itself, rather than at both the conduct and the context in which it occurs.” Dale Carpenter, Unanimously Wrong, 2006 CATO SUP. CT. REV. 217, 243 (2006).
Jaycees. It first considers Justice Brennan’s unconvincing focus on the size, seclusion, and selectivity of the Jaycees in his attempt to cast the group as nonintimate. It then turns to the ways in which both Brennan and Justice O’Connor, in her concurrence, characterized the purpose and activities of the Jaycees in denying the group protection as an expressive association.

A. Size, Seclusion, Selectivity, and the Specter of Segregation

After distinguishing between intimate and nonintimate associations, Justice Brennan attempted to determine where an association’s “objective characteristics locate it on a spectrum from the most intimate to the most attenuated of personal attachments.” He defined an intimate association as “distinguished by such attributes as relative smallness, a high degree of selectivity in decisions to begin and maintain the affiliation, and seclusion from others in critical aspects of the relationship.” He noted that factors relevant to determining intimacy include “size, purpose, policies, selectivity, congeniality, and other characteristics that in a particular case may be pertinent.” The size of an association is critical to Brennan’s argument. He had reported in the first part of his opinion that the Jaycees was a 295,000-member organization. In considering whether the group was an intimate association, he observed that even “the local chapters of the Jaycees are large and basically unselective groups.” The Minneapolis chapter, for example, had “approximately 430 members.” These figures are meant to persuade the reader that the Jaycees clearly falls outside of the bounds of an intimate association. But Brennan’s numbers also deflect attention away from the actual relationships that undoubtedly formed in local chapters of the large national organization. It is hard to imagine the Minneapolis Jaycees coming together in meetings, social events, charitable activities, and planning sessions without meaningful interaction between members, including some that led to close friendships.

---

172 Id. at 620. Brennan continued: “As a general matter, only relationships with these sorts of qualities are likely to reflect the considerations that have led to an understanding of freedom of association as an intrinsic element of personal liberty.” Id.
173 Id. Brennan’s appeal to “other characteristics that in a particular case may be pertinent” has not offered a very clear judicial test for defining the contours of intimate association. As Justice Stevens noted in his Dale dissent, “the precise scope of the right to intimate association is unclear.” Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 698 n.26 (2000) (Stevens, J., dissenting); see also Udell, supra note 83, at 239–40 (describing the “chaos” of lower court attempts to construe intimate association and noting “myriad tests, even within the same circuit”). But see supra note 84 and accompanying text (suggesting that courts have found most associations to be nonintimate).
174 See Roberts, 468 U.S. at 613 (“At the time of trial in August 1981, the Jaycees had approximately 295,000 members in 7,400 local chapters affiliated with [fifty-one] state organizations.”).
175 Id. at 621.
176 Id.
and personal bonds.

Brennan’s focus on lack of seclusion as an indicator of intimacy is also problematic. He critiqued the Jaycees because women and nonmembers—“strangers,” actually—were present at the group’s events:

[Women affiliated with the Jaycees attend various meetings, participate in selected projects, and engage in many of the organization’s social functions. Indeed, numerous nonmembers of both genders regularly participate in a substantial portion of activities central to the decision of many members to associate with one another, including many of the organization’s various community programs, awards ceremonies, and recruitment meetings. In short, the local chapters of the Jaycees are neither small nor selective. Moreover, much of the activity central to the formation and maintenance of the association involves the participation of strangers to that relationship.]

These assertions raise a number of questions. How does Brennan know which activities were “central to the decision of many members to associate with one another”? Similarly, on what basis can he purport to know “the activity central to the formation and maintenance of the association”? Even if he were capable of making these determinations, what is the significance of the fact that “strangers” participated in “various community programs, awards ceremonies, and recruitment meetings”? Isn’t this the case with many associations that rent conference space, enlist professional fundraisers, or cater their events?

Brennan’s least convincing argument in his attempt to characterize the Jaycees as nonintimate was his focus on the group’s lack of selectivity. He distinguished the Kiwanis Club from the Jaycees because the Kiwanis had “a formal procedure for choosing members on the basis of specific and selective criteria” while the Jaycees looked only at gender and age. That distinction seems strained, and it also calls into question the relationship between selectivity and intimacy. Book clubs, gardening clubs, and some recreational sports leagues are often less selective than the Jaycees in their 177 Id. (internal citations omitted).

---

178 Id.
179 Id.
180 Cf. id. at 635 (O’Connor, J., concurring) (“No association is likely ever to be exclusively engaged in expressive activities, if only because it will collect dues from its members or purchase printing materials or rent lecture halls or serve coffee and cakes at its meetings.”). One might also wonder exactly which “local chapters of the Jaycees” Brennan is describing, given that the Minneapolis and St. Paul Jaycees already admitted women as full members. Id. at 627 (majority opinion).
181 Id. at 621, 630. In fact, the Jaycees looked at more than gender and age. See U.S. Jaycees v. McClure, 709 F.2d 1560, 1571–72 (8th Cir. 1983) (noting that the St. Paul bylaws required that applicants be of “good character and reputation”).
membership requirements, but they can foster intimate connections among their members.

Brennan’s focus on selectivity did, however, establish a link between the Jaycees and segregationist groups. To support his contention that “the local chapters of the Jaycees are large and basically unselective groups,” Brennan cited three cases: Tillman v. Wheaton-Haven Recreation Ass’n, Sullivan v. Little Hunting Park, Inc., and Daniel v. Paul. But the problem with Tillman, Sullivan, and Daniel wasn’t that they employed a single membership criterion. It was that the criterion was: (1) race; (2) used by whites to exclude blacks; (3) in membership groups closely tied to housing (Tillman and Sullivan) or created as an obvious sham (Daniel); (4) in the midst of the Civil Rights Era. The constitutional rationale underlying these cases wasn’t that unselective groups lacked an intimacy worthy of constitutional protection but that: (1) their lack of selectivity factored against qualifying under the public club exception to the public accommodations provisions of the Civil Rights Act of 1964; and (2) “the exclusion of Negroes from white communities” reflected “the badges and incidents of slavery.”

Toward the end of his Roberts’s opinion, Brennan revisited the connection between the Jaycees and segregationist groups:

Even if enforcement of the [Minnesota] Act causes some incidental abridgment of the Jaycees’ protected speech, that effect is no greater than is necessary to accomplish the State’s legitimate purposes. As we have explained, acts of invidious discrimination in the distribution of publicly available goods, services, and other advantages cause unique evils that government has a compelling interest to prevent—wholly apart from the point of view such conduct may transmit. Accordingly, like violence or other types of potentially expressive activities that produce special harms distinct from their communicative impact, such practices are entitled to no constitutional protection. In prohibiting such practices, the Minnesota Act therefore “responds precisely to the substantive problem which legitimately concerns” the 183 468 U.S. at 621.

---

State and abridges no more speech or associational freedom than is necessary to accomplish that purpose.\textsuperscript{188}

Notice the italicized language. It adds little to Brennan’s analysis of whether Minnesota’s Act was narrowly tailored and minimally intrusive (the doctrinal focus of the paragraph). In fact, it contradicts that analysis, asserting that the Jaycees’s desire to limit the participation of women was “entitled to no constitutional protection.”\textsuperscript{189} If the right of expressive association was “plainly implicated in this case,”\textsuperscript{190} then it clearly enjoyed some constitutional protection. Brennan’s citation to Runyon is also problematic. His pincite tags Stewart’s distinction between belief and practice, which rested on the view that “even some private discrimination is subject to special remedial legislation in certain circumstances under § 2 of the Thirteenth Amendment.”\textsuperscript{191} Stewart relied on the Thirteenth Amendment in this passage not as a source of congressional power but for the direct authority to interfere with some forms of private discrimination. That raises the question of whether the principle announced in Runyon trumps a right of association claim in cases involving discrimination not based on race.\textsuperscript{192} Brennan never explained how remedying the “unique evils” in Runyon (rooted in the “badges and incidents of slavery”) provided a legal justification for destroying the Jaycees for their gender-based discrimination.

Whether he intended it or not, the real force of Brennan’s references to Runyon and “invidious discrimination” was the visceral emotion that they stirred, equating the Jaycees’s position to the racism of segregation.\textsuperscript{193} The Jaycees had warned of this danger in its brief to the Court:

> Sprinkled throughout the opposing briefs are references to “invidious discrimination” as applied to the Jaycees’ all-male policy. The term is used in such cases as Runyon v. McCrary and Gilmore v. City of Montgomery against a backdrop of racial discrimination. The use of this term is \textsuperscript{188} Roberts, 468 U.S. at 628–29 (emphasis added) (citations omitted) (quoting City Council of L.A. v. Taxpayers for Vincent, 466 U.S. 789, 810 (1984)). Both Roberts and the Civil Rights cases Brennan cited stretched the meaning of “public accommodation” to bring private activity within the reach of the relevant statutes.

\textsuperscript{189} Id. at 628.

\textsuperscript{190} Id. at 622.

\textsuperscript{192} Cf. William Buss, Discrimination by Private Clubs, 67 WASH. U. L.Q. 815, 826 (1989) (“The thirteenth amendment, then, seems a fully adequate power to prevent race discrimination and race-like discrimination, but it is not a likely candidate as a source of federal legislative power for preventing private club discrimination on the basis of sex.”).

\textsuperscript{193} Roberts, 468 U.S. at 628; cf. Bernstein, Expressive Association, supra note 24, at 200–01 (“Brennan characterized the Jaycees’ discriminatory practices as akin to violence and not worthy of constitutional protection, and therefore gave the right of expressive association short shrift in his compelling interest analysis.”).
apparently intended to suggest that the Jaycees’ all-male membership policy is somehow immoral and unsavory and therefore not entitled to protection against the State’s police powers.194

Yet rather than heed this warning, Brennan embraced the comparison, writing the “stigmatizing injury [of discrimination], and the denial of equal opportunities that accompanies it, is surely felt as strongly by persons suffering discrimination on the basis of their sex as by those treated differently because of their race.”195 In one sense, the claim is correct—the kind of exclusion in which the Jaycees engaged is undoubtedly hurtful and stigmatizing to some people. But we ought to pause before accepting Brennan’s specific application of the general principle. It is not clear that the circumstances facing women in Minneapolis in 1984 were on the same order of those facing African Americans in Montgomery in 1974, or that the judicial remedies in these situations would have accomplished objectives of similar magnitude, and these differences may well have mattered had Brennan engaged in a meaningful weighing of constitutional values.

B. Monolithic Meaning

The Court’s treatment of the Jaycees in Roberts also illustrates the thin protections of expressive association when expression is narrowly construed. Justice Brennan contended that the Jaycees “failed to demonstrate that the Act impose[d] any serious burdens on the male members’ freedom of expressive association.”196 He dismissed as “sexual stereotyping” the Jaycees’ argument that allowing women to vote “will change the content or impact of the organization’s speech.”197 Judge

---

195 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 625.
196 Id. (emphasis added). The assertion is indefensible. See Soifer, supra note 24, at 40 (“Surely the Jaycees . . . will be a different organization [after admitting women with voting rights]. Surely that difference will be felt throughout an intricate web of relationships and different voices in immeasurable but nonetheless significant ways.”); Richard W. Garnett, Jaycees Reconsidered: Judge Richard S. Arnold and the Freedom of Association, 58 ARK. L. REV. 587, 597 n.53 (2005) (“[If the application of the Human Rights Act really imposed no ‘serious burdens’ on the freedom of expressive association, it is not clear why the Act’s application should require justification under the Court’s strict-scrutiny methodology.”); Kateb, supra note 24, at 55 (“Brennan’s claim that young women may, after their compulsory admission, contribute to the allowable purpose of ‘promoting the interests of young men’ is absurd.”); Rosenblum, Compelled Association, supra note 87, at 78 (“The Jaycees’ ‘voice’ was undeniably altered once it was forced to admit young women as full members along with young men.”). But see Sunder, supra note 24, at 539 (“In Roberts and the cases immediately following it, the balance between liberty and equality swung in favor of equality interests because the associations at issue offered no evidence of any expressive message that would be threatened by inclusion of the plaintiffs.”).
197 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 628. Richard Garnett suggests that some of Brennan’s “assertions sound dated today, like the kind of things one might have expected from an elderly, well-meaning, liberal
Richard Arnold’s reasoning in the court below provides a useful contrast:

If the statute is upheld, the basic purpose of the Jaycees will change. It will become an association for the advancement of young people. . . .

. . . .

[S]ome change in the Jaycees’ philosophical cast can reasonably be expected. It is not hard to imagine, for example, that if women become full-fledged members in any substantial numbers, it will not be long before efforts are made to change the Jaycees’ Creed. Young women may take a dim view of affirming the “brotherhood of man,” or declaring how “free men” can best win economic justice. Such phrases are not trivial. The use of language betrays an attitude of mind, even if unconsciously, and that attitude is part of the belief and expression that the First Amendment protects. 198

Judge Arnold’s attention to the Jaycees’ expressivism is missing not only from Brennan’s opinion but also from Justice O’Connor’s concurrence. 199 O’Connor concluded that the Jaycees’s attention to and success in membership drives meant that it was “first and foremost, an organization that, at both the national and local levels, promote[d] and practice[d] the art of solicitation and management.” 200 Other language in her concurrence suggested that:

[A]n association should be characterized as commercial, and therefore subject to rationally related state regulation of its membership and other associational activities, when, and only when, the association’s activities are not predominantly of the type protected by the First Amendment. It is only when the association is predominantly engaged in protected expression that state regulation of its membership will necessarily affect, change, dilute, or silence one collective male jurist eager to say ‘the right thing’ about sex discrimination and stereotypes in the mid-1980s.” Garnett, supra note 196, at 600.

---

200 Roberts, 468 U.S. at 639 (O’Connor, J., concurring) (emphasis added).
voice that would otherwise be heard.\textsuperscript{201}

O’Connor’s reasoning is problematic on three counts. First, she posits a false dichotomy between commercial and expressive associations—associations can be both commercial and expressive.\textsuperscript{202} Second, her requirement that an association be “predominantly engaged”\textsuperscript{203} in protected expression to avoid being classified as commercial hurts associations that, because of their size or unpopularity, must devote a substantial portion of their activities to fundraising or other commercial activities.\textsuperscript{204} Finally, she leaves unclear which activities are “of the type protected by the First Amendment.”\textsuperscript{205}

Judge Arnold’s opinion offers a very different perspective to O’Connor’s assertion that the Jaycees was “first and foremost” a commercial association:

Some of what local chapters do is purely social. They have parties, with no purpose more complicated than enjoying themselves. Some of it is civic. They have conducted a radio fund-raising drive to combat multiple sclerosis. They have conducted a women’s professional golf tournament. They have engaged in many other charitable and educational projects for the public good. (And there is no claim, incidentally, of any discrimination in the offering to the public of the benefits of these projects. Money raised to fight disease, for example, is not used to benefit only male patients.) And they have advocated, through the years, a multitude of political and social causes. Governmental affairs is one of the chief areas of the organization’s activity. Members on a national, state, and local basis are frequently meeting, debating issues of public policy, taking more or less controversial stands, and making opinions known to local, state, and national officials.\textsuperscript{206}

Arnold further elaborated:

\textsuperscript{201}Id. at 635–36.

\textsuperscript{203}Roberts, 468 U.S. at 635 (O’Connor, J., concurring).

\textsuperscript{204}One of the clearest illustrations of this consequence is the disparate effect of some charitable solicitation regulation on small or unpopular charities. See John D. Inazu, Making Sense of Schaumburg: Seeking Coherence in First Amendment Charitable Solicitation Law, 92 MARQ. L. REV. 551, 581–83 (2009) (explaining that, in the area of charitable solicitation, the more burdensome content-neutral regulations tend to threaten less established charities, and thus endanger their First Amendment rights).

\textsuperscript{205}Roberts, 468 U.S. at 635 (O’Connor, J., concurring).

\textsuperscript{206}U.S. Jaycees v. McClure, 709 F.2d 1560, 1569 (8th Cir. 1983).
The Jaycees does not simply sell seats in some kind of personal-development classroom. Personal and business development, if they come, come not as products bought by members, but as by-products of activities in which members engage after they join the organization. These activities are variously social, civic, and ideological, and some of them fall within the narrowest view of First Amendment freedom of association.\(^{207}\)

His view is consistent with the Jaycees’ own assertions that they were:

\[\text{[O]}rganized for such educational and charitable purposes as will promote and foster the growth and development of young men’s civic organizations in the United States, designed to inculcate in the individual membership of such organization a spirit of genuine Americanism and civic interest, and as a supplementary education institution to provide them with opportunity for personal development and achievement and an avenue for intelligent participation by young men in the affairs of their community, state and nation, and to develop true friendship and understanding among young men of all nations.}\(^{208}\)

Parsing which of these activities constitute the group’s “predominate” activities is a difficult interpretive task, one that neither Brennan nor O’Connor undertook.\(^{209}\)

VI. WHY DOCTRINE MATTERS

The harm of the doctrinal framework in Roberts did not end with the Jaycees. The categories of intimate and expressive association continue to shape legal decisions that profoundly affect people’s lives. This section recounts two more recent examples of groups that have suffered under the Roberts framework.\(^{210}\) The first is the Chi Iota Colony of the Alpha

\(^{207}\) Id.
\(^{208}\) Brief of Appellee, \textit{supra} note 194, at *5.
\(^{209}\) Brennan’s opinion did note that the Jaycees engaged in “protected expression on political, economic, cultural, and social affairs” and recognized that “the Jaycees regularly engage in a variety of civic, charitable, lobbying, fundraising, and other activities worthy of constitutional protection under the First Amendment.” \textit{Roberts}, 468 U.S. at 626–27. But in the very next sentence, he wrote that there was “no basis in the record for concluding that admission of women as full voting members will impede the organization’s ability to engage in these protected activities or to disseminate its preferred views.” \textit{Id.} at 627.
Epsilon Pi fraternity at the College of Staten Island (a nonintimate nonexpressive association). The second is the student chapter of the Christian Legal Society at Hastings Law School (a nonintimate expressive association).

A. The Chi Iota Colony of Alpha Epsilon Pi

Alpha Epsilon Pi (“AEPi”) is a national social fraternity founded in 1913 “to provide opportunities for the Jewish college man seeking the best possible college and fraternity experience.”

According to its Supreme Constitution, AEPi seeks “to promote and encourage among its members: Personal perfection, a reverence for God and an honorable life devoted to the ideal of service to all mankind; lasting friendships and the attainment of nobility of action and better understanding among all faiths . . . .”

In 2002, the Chi Iota Colony (“Chi Iota”) of AEPi formed at the College of Staten Island. Between 2002 and 2005, Chi Iota never had more than twenty members. Its past president described the purpose of the fraternity as fostering a “lifelong interpersonal bond termed brotherhood,” which “results in deep attachments and commitments to the other members of the Fraternity whom is shared a community of thoughts, experiences, beliefs and distinctly personal aspects of their lives.”

In furtherance of those goals, the fraternity limited its membership to males.

Chi Iota applied to be chartered and officially recognized by the College of Staten Island in March 2004. The Director of the Office of Student Life denied the application on the basis that the fraternity’s exclusion of women violated the college’s nondiscrimination policy.\footnote{Id.} The denial of official recognition precluded Chi Iota from using the college’s facilities, resources, and funding, as well as from using the college’s name in conjunction with the group’s name, and from posting events to the college’s calendars.\footnote{Id. at 389, 395.}

In 2005, the members of Chi Iota filed suit in the United States District Court for the Eastern District of New York, arguing violations of their rights to intimate and expressive association and to equal protection.\footnote{Chi Iota Colony of Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity v. City Univ. of N.Y., 502 F.3d 136, 149 (2d Cir. 2007).} The district court granted the fraternity’s motion for a preliminary injunction against the college on its intimate association claim but concluded that Chi Iota had not shown a clear or substantial likelihood of success on its expressive association claim.\footnote{Id. at 389, 395.} On appeal, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit reversed the district court’s grant of a preliminary injunction and remanded the case, noting that the fraternity’s “interests in intimate association are relatively weak.”\footnote{Chi Iota Colony of Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity v. City Univ. of N.Y., 502 F.3d 136, 149 (2d Cir. 2007).}

Although the district court would still have had Chi Iota’s intimate and expressive association claims before it on remand, neither looked to have a reasonable chance of success given the posture of the litigation. As the Second Circuit was considering the case, the Chi Iota Colony of the Alpha Epsilon Pi Fraternity at the College of Staten Island disbanded.\footnote{E-mail from Gregory F. Hauser, to author (Sept. 30, 2009) (on file with author and Connecticut Law Review). Mr. Hauser represented Chi Iota in the litigation.}

Chi Iota is not the most sympathetic plaintiff to bring a freedom of association claim. Although its Jewish roots suggested religious freedom interests, most of its members were nonpracticing Jews.\footnote{See Chi Iota, 443 F. Supp. 2d at 378 (quoting Chi Iota’s president, explaining that the fraternity members were “not extremely religious, but [did] talk about [their contributions] to the community, an expression of Judaism”).} It was a social group, but some of its social activities were coarse and banal, including visits to strip clubs.\footnote{Chi Iota, 502 F.3d at 141.} It may well be that the brothers of Chi Iota were a self-focused, hedonistic group of boys who brought a collective drain on whatever community existed at the mostly commuter campus at the College of Staten Island.\footnote{Of course, the brothers of Chi Iota may also have had many endearing characteristics, especially to one another. As David Bernstein notes: [M]any believe that college fraternity and sorority members experience a “special camaraderie” that would not exist if members of the opposite sex were included.}
But all of this is beside the point. Associational protections should not turn on whether a group’s purposes or activities are sincere or wholesome to an outsider’s perspective. The group’s practices and activities meant something to the brothers of Chi Iota. They meant enough for the brothers to pursue membership through an application and rush process, to participate in the group’s activities, and to bring a federal lawsuit in an attempt to preserve their associational bonds.

B. The Christian Legal Society at Hastings Law School

The Christian Legal Society (“CLS”) is a “nationwide association of lawyers, law students, law professors, and judges who profess faith in Jesus Christ.”

Founded in 1961, its purposes include “providing a means of society, fellowship, and nurture among Christian lawyers; encouraging, discipling, and aiding Christian law students; promoting justice, religious liberty, and biblical conflict resolution; and encouraging lawyers to furnish legal services to the poor.”

CLS maintains student chapters at many law schools around the country. These student chapters invite anyone to participate in their events but require members—including officers—to sign a Statement of Faith consistent with the Protestant evangelical and Catholic traditions. Part of this Statement of Faith affirms that sexual conduct should be confined to heterosexual marriage. Accordingly, CLS student chapters do not accept as members anyone who engaged in or affirmed the morality of sex outside of heterosexual marriage.

In 2004, the CLS chapter at Hastings Law School in San Francisco inquired about becoming a recognized student organization. Hastings officials withheld recognition because CLS’s Statement of Faith violated the religion and sexual orientation provisions of the school’s...
Nondiscrimination Policy. As a result, the school denied CLS travel funds and funding from student activity fees. It also denied them the use of the school’s logo, use of a Hastings e-mail address, the opportunity to send mass e-mails to the student body, participation in the annual student organizations fair, and reserved meeting spaces on campus. Hastings subsequently asserted that its denial of recognition stemmed from an “accept-all-comers” policy that required any student organization to accept any student who desired to be a member of the organization.

CLS filed suit in federal district court asserting violations of expressive association, free speech, free exercise of religion, and equal protection. In Christian Legal Society v. Kane, the court granted summary judgment against CLS on all of its claims. With respect to CLS’s expressive association claim, the court concluded that Roberts and Dale were inapplicable because “CLS is not being forced, as a private entity, to include certain members or officers” and “the conditioned exclusion of [an] organization from a particular forum [does] not rise to the level of compulsive membership.” The court also asserted that “Hastings has denied CLS official recognition based on CLS’s conduct—its refusal to comply with Hastings’s Nondiscrimination Policy—not because of CLS’s philosophies or beliefs.”

Despite resting its holding on the inapplicability of Roberts and Dale, the court held in the alternative that CLS’s claim failed under those circumstances. Petitioners’ associational interests also were circumscribed by the denial of the use of campus bulletin boards and the school newspaper. If an organization is to remain a viable entity in a campus community in which new students enter on a regular basis, it must possess the means of communicating with these students. Moreover, the organization’s ability to participate in the intellectual give and take of campus debate, and to pursue its stated purposes, is limited by denial of access to the customary media for communicating with the administration, faculty members, and other students. Such impediments cannot be viewed as insubstantial.

---

233 Id. at 9.
234 Id. at 10.
236 Kane, 2006 WL 997217, at *4.
238 Kane, 2006 WL 997217, at *4.
239 The district court granted leave for a group called Hastings Outlaw to intervene in the case. Outlaw asserted that its members had a right to be officers and voting members in any other campus group (including CLS) and that its members opposed their student activity fees funding an organization that they found offensive. Petition for Writ of Certiorari, supra note 227, at 10–11.
240 Id., at *15 (citing Boy Scouts of Am. v. Wyman, 335 F.3d 80, 91 (2d Cir. 2003)).
241 Id. at *17.
It assumed that CLS qualified as an expressive association because Hastings did not dispute that characterization. But the court determined that “CLS has not demonstrated that its ability to express its views would be significantly impaired by complying with [the school’s nondiscrimination] requirement.” The court concluded:

[U]nlike the Boy Scouts in Dale, CLS has not submitted any evidence demonstrating that teaching certain values to other students is part of the organization’s mission or purpose, or that it seeks to do so by example, such that the mere presence of someone who does not fully comply with the prescribed code of conduct would force CLS to send a message contrary to its mission.

In fact, the court found “no evidence” that “a non-orthodox Christian, gay, lesbian, or bisexual student” who became a member or officer of CLS, “by [his or her] presence alone, would impair CLS’s ability to convey its beliefs.” That conclusion repeats the fallacy in Runyon that forcing integration on a racist group wouldn’t alter its message and the fallacy in Roberts that forcing an all-male group to accept women wouldn’t alter its message.

CLS appealed the district court’s decision to the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit. The appellate court affirmed the district court with a terse two-sentence opinion: “The parties stipulate that Hastings imposes an open membership rule on all student groups—all groups must accept all comers as voting members even if those individuals disagree with the mission of the group. The conditions on recognition are therefore viewpoint neutral and reasonable.”

CLS petitioned for a writ of certiorari to the United States Supreme Court, arguing, among other things, that the Ninth Circuit’s Kane decision (subsequently restyled as Christian Legal Society v. Martinez) created a circuit split with a Seventh Circuit case invalidating the denial of official recognition to a CLS student chapter at the Southern Illinois University School of Law.

A divided Supreme Court rejected CLS’s challenge. Justice

---

241 Id. at *20; cf. Christian Legal Soc’y v. Walker, 453 F.3d 853, 862 (7th Cir. 2006) (“It would be hard to argue—and no one does—that CLS is not an expressive association.”).
242 Kane, 2006 WL 997217, at *20.
243 Id. at *22.
244 Id. at *23.
245 Christian Legal Soc’y v. Kane, 319 F. App’x 645 (9th Cir. 2009), cert. granted, Christian Legal Soc’y v. Martinez, 130 S. Ct. 795 (2009), aff’d and remanded, 130 S. Ct. 2971 (2010). The court cited its opinion in Truth v. Kent School District, 542 F.3d 634, 649–50 (9th Cir. 2008), in which it ruled that a school district could deny recognition to a high school Bible club that limited its voting members and officers to those who shared the group’s beliefs.
Ginsburg’s majority opinion concluded that Hastings’ all-comers policy was “a reasonable, viewpoint-neutral condition on access to the student-organization forum.”

The majority’s free speech analysis is not entirely persuasive—its reasoning obscures a tension between the viewpoint neutrality of the all-comers policy (under a public forum analysis) and Hastings’ non-neutral policy preferences expressed through its own speech and subsidies (under something akin to a government speech analysis). But in the context of this Article, an even more disturbing aspect of the opinion is the majority’s failure to take seriously CLS’s freedom of association claim.

From the premise that it “makes little sense to treat CLS’s speech and association claims as discrete,” Ginsburg concluded that the Court’s “limited-public-forum precedents supply the appropriate framework for assessing both CLS’s speech and association rights.” The problem with this doctrinal move is two-fold. First, it essentially elects rational basis scrutiny over strict scrutiny, and therefore all but preordains the outcome. Second, it casts aside the competing constitutional values underlying CLS’s freedom of association claim.

---

248 Id. at 2978.
249 Id. at 3000 (Alito, J., dissenting).
250 See, e.g., id. at 2976 (Hastings’ policy “encourages tolerance, cooperation, and learning among students” and “conveys the Law School’s decision ‘to decline to subsidize with public monies and benefits conduct of which the people of California disapprove.’”). In addition to the doctrinal complications, Martinez involved a disputed factual question as to whether Hastings’ applied an all-comers policy or a policy that prohibited certain kinds of discrimination, including discrimination based upon religion and sexual orientation. The Court remanded on the question of whether Hastings selectively applied its all-comers policy. Id. at 2995. While this factual question might be important to a public forum analysis, it is less relevant to the freedom of association analysis that I believe the Court should have made. The strength of CLS’s constitutional claim to exist as a group should not turn on whether the restriction against it is viewpoint neutral or selectively enforced against it.
251 Id.
252 See id. (“[T]he same considerations that have led us to apply a less restrictive level of scrutiny to speech in limited public forums as compared to other environments apply with equal force to expressive association occurring in limited public forums.”); id. (“[T]he strict scrutiny we have applied in some settings to laws that burden expressive association would, in practical effect, invalidate a defining characteristic of limited public forums—the State may ‘reserv[e] [them] for certain groups’”). After deciding to pursue a public forum analysis, the viewpoint neutrality of Hastings’ all-comers policy was self-evident to the majority. See id. at 2993 (“It is, after all, hard to imagine a more viewpoint-neutral policy than one requiring all student groups to accept all comers.”); id. (“An all-comers condition on access to RSO status, in short, is textbook viewpoint neutral.”). Accordingly, the majority “consider[ed] whether Hastings’ policy is reasonable taking into account the RSO forum’s function and all the surrounding circumstances,” id. at 2988, and concluded that “the several justifications Hastings asserts in support of its all-comers requirement are surely reasonable in light of the RSO forum’s purposes.” Id. at 2991.
253 For example Ginsburg cites an important article by Eugene Volokh. Id. at 2985–86 (citing Eugene Volokh, Freedom of Expressive Association and Government Subsidies, 58 STAN. L. REV. 1919, 1940 (2006)). Among other things, Volokh’s article considers a conflict very similar to the one at issue in Martinez: whether a public university can apply antidiscrimination rules to the Christian Legal Society. Id. at 1935. Ginsburg highlights Volokh’s observation that a school may limit official recognition to groups comprised only of students, even though this infringes upon the associational CLS’s associational claim highlights the underlying conflict of values in this case: the clash between group autonomy and equality, the same tension at issue in Runyon and Roberts. Taking this values clash seriously means refusing to make an artificial distinction between expression and conduct and recognizing that, in some cases, they are one in the same. Contrary to Justice Ginsburg’s insistence that “CLS’s conduct—not its Christian perspective—is, from Hastings’ vantage point, what stands between the group and RSO [registered student organization] status,” CLS’s “conduct” is inseparable from its message.

Ginsburg’s opinion misses this connection. Quoting from CLS’s brief, she writes that “expressive association in this case is ‘the functional equivalent of speech itself’” to set up the idea that expressive association is entitled to no more constitutional protection than speech. But CLS had asserted:

[W]here one of the central purposes of a noncommercial expressive association is the communication of a moral teaching, its choice of who will formulate and articulate that message is treated as the functional equivalent of speech itself.

CLS wasn’t arguing that association is nothing more than speech but that association is itself a form of expression—who it selects as its members and leaders communicates a message. CLS underscored this point elsewhere in its brief, arguing that “[b]ecause a group’s leaders define and shape the group’s message, the right to select leaders is an essential element of its right to speak.” Ginsburg interpreted this assertion to mean that “CLS suggests that its expressive-association claim plays a part auxiliary to speech’s starring role.” That interpretation may be consistent with the Roberts understanding of expressive association, but as I have argued throughout this Article, it misses the more fundamental connection between a group’s message and its composition.

Ginsburg distinguished the Court’s associational cases like Dale and Roberts because those cases “involved regulations that compelled a group freedoms of those who wish to form a group with non-students. Martinez, 130 S. Ct. at 2986. The point is a nice one, but the non-student constraint could also be construed as a jurisdictional limit linked far more closely (and less ideologically) to the nature of the public forum than an all-comers policy. More importantly, Volokh spends considerable time accounting for the values introduced by the right of association. Volokh, supra, at 1935. The majority subsumes this dimension into its speech analysis and avoids the harder questions.

254 Martinez, 130 S. Ct. at 2994.
255 Id. at 2984–85 (quoting Brief for Petitioner, supra note 2, at 35).
256 Brief for Petitioner, supra note 2, at 35.
257 Id. at 18.
258 Martinez, 130 S. Ct. at 2985 (citing Brief for Petitioner, supra note 2, at 18).
to include unwanted members, with no choice to opt out.”

But this is really a matter of perspective. Sometimes a group must choose between receiving benefits and adhering to its policies at the cost of those benefits. But withholding some benefits—like access to meeting space or email lists or the opportunity to be part of a public forum—can be akin to stamping out a group’s existence. After Martinez, the Hastings-Christian-Group-that-Accepts-All-Comers can exist, and the Christian-Legal-Society-for-Hastings-Law-Students-that-Can-Sometimes-Meet-on-Campus-as-a-Matter-of-University-Discretion-If-Space-Is-Available-but-Can’t-Recruit-Members-at-the-Student-Activities-Fair can exist. But the Hastings Christian Legal Society—whose views and purposes are in no way sanctioned by and can be explicitly disavowed by Hastings—cannot.

VII. REMEMBERING THE RIGHT OF ASSEMBLY

On the same day that the Court issued its Martinez opinion, it released its decision in McDonald v. City of Chicago. Justice Alito’s opinion in the latter case observed:

> In United States v. Cruikshank, the Court held that the general “right of the people peaceably to assemble for lawful purposes,” which is protected by the First Amendment, applied only against the Federal Government and not against the states. Nonetheless, over 60 years later the Court held that the right of peaceful assembly was a “fundamental right... safeguarded by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

It was only the sixth time in the last twenty years that the Court had even mentioned the right of assembly. But this passing nod to a long-forgotten right gestured toward the constitutional framework that should have decided Martinez and should have protected the Christian Legal Society.

From the House debates over the Bill of Rights that appealed to William Penn’s defense of assembly to the rallying cries of the Democratic-Republican Societies, from the early suffragist and abolitionist movements of the antebellum era to the labor and civil rights movements of the Progressive Era, and from the political rhetoric of Abraham Lincoln to the political rhetoric of Martin Luther King, Jr., the right of assembly has emphasized the importance of shielding dissident groups from a state-enforced majoritarianism throughout our nation’s history. As C. Edwin Baker has argued, “the function of constitutional rights, and more specifically the role of the right of assembly, is to protect self-expressive, nonviolent, noncoercive conduct from majority norms or political balancing and even to permit people to be offensive, annoying, or challenging to dominant norms.” This role of assembly and its appeal to groups of different ideologies “makes it a better ‘fit’ than the right of association within our nation’s legal and political heritage.” Indeed, principles of constitutional interpretation suggest that the First Amendment’s right of assembly, not the late-arriving and judicially-constructed right of association, holds a central place in our constitutional tradition.

The importance of assembly is strikingly evident in Justice Brandeis’s famous opinion in Whitney v. California. The now discredited majority opinion expressed particular concern that Anita Whitney had undertaken her actions in concert with others, which “involve[d] even greater threat to the public peace and security than the isolated utterances and acts of 265 See generally Inazu, Forgotten Freedom, supra note 15 (chronicling the role of assembly in these historical events and movements).

---

268 Philip Bobbitt has suggested that we engage in six modalities of constitutional argument: textual, structural, prudential, historical, doctrinal, and ethical). PHILIP BOBBITT, CONSTITUTIONAL FATE: THEORY OF THE CONSTITUTION xi, 7–8 (1982).

individuals.”270

Rejecting this rationale, Brandeis penned some of the most well-known words in American jurisprudence:

Those who won our independence . . . believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them, discussion affords ordinarily adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American government.271

The freedoms of “speech and assembly” lie at the heart of Brandeis’s argument—the phrase appears eleven times in his brief concurrence. The Court had linked these two freedoms only once before; after Whitney, the nexus occurs in over one hundred of its opinions.272 Brandeis’s entwining of speech and assembly establishes two important connections. First, it recognizes that a group’s expression includes not only the spoken words of those assembled but also the expressive message inherent in the group’s existence. Second, it emphasizes that the rights of speech and assembly extend across time, preceding the actual moment of expression or gathering.273 Just as freedom of speech guards against restrictions imposed prior to an act of speaking, assembly guards against restrictions imposed prior to an act of assembling—it protects a group’s autonomy, composition, and existence.274

270 Whitney, 274 U.S. at 372.
272 The only mention of “speech and assembly” prior to Whitney came in New York ex rel Doyle v. Atwell, 261 U.S. 590, 591 (1923) (noting that petitioners alleged a deprivation of the “rights of freedom of speech and assembly”).
273 See, e.g., N.Y. Times v. United States, 403 U.S. 713, 720–25 (1971) (Douglas, J., concurring); Kingsley Int'l Pictures Corp. v. New York, 360 U.S. 684, 697–98 (1959) (Douglas J., dissenting) (“I can find in the First Amendment no room for any censor whether he is scanning an editorial, reading a news broadcast, editing a novel or a play, or previewing a movie.”); Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395, 423 (1953) (Douglas, J., dissenting) (“There is no free speech in the sense of the Constitution when permission must be obtained from an official before a speech can be made. That is a previous restraint condemned by history and at war with the First Amendment.”).
274 See NAACP v. Alabama ex rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449, 462 (1958) (noting that Douds referred to “the varied forms of governmental action which might interfere with freedom of assembly”
As M. Glenn Abernathy argued in his seminal work, The Right of Assembly and Association, assembly “need not be artificially narrowed to encompass only the physical assemblage in a park or meeting hall” but “can justifiably be extended to include as well those persons who are joined together through organizational affiliation.”

Abernathy also noted that assembly avoids the artificial line-drawing inherent in the right of association. Writing in 1961, he observed that the Court’s initial recognition of a constitutional right of association three years earlier had inserted an instrumental gloss on group autonomy:

> It must be noted that [NAACP v. Alabama] does not clearly extend the First Amendment protection to all lawful affiliations or organizations. What Justice Harlan discusses is the association “for the advancement of beliefs and ideas.” Clearly a vast number of existing associations would fall within this description, but it is questionable whether the characterization would fit the purely social club, the garden club, or perhaps even some kinds of trade or professional unions.

As Abernathy noted, this message-based analysis—explicitly recognized twenty-six years later in Roberts’s category of expressive association—is absent in the right of assembly: “No such distinction has been drawn in the cases squarely involving freedom of assembly questions. The latter cases emphasize that the right extends to any lawful assembly, without a specific requirement that there be an intention to advance beliefs and ideas.”

The right of assembly may thus provide a less arbitrary and more persuasive framework for protecting dissenting practices than the right of... expressive association. Its approach is captured in Justice Rutledge’s opinion in one of the most important cases on the right of assembly, Thomas v. Collins. Rutledge argued that, because of the “preferred place given in our scheme to the great, the indispensable democratic freedoms secured by the First Amendment,” only “the gravest abuses, endangering paramount interests, give occasion for permissible limitation.” He explained:

> Where the line shall be placed in a particular application rests, not on such generalities, but on the concrete clash of particular interests and the community’s relative evaluation [of] both of them and of how the one will be affected by the specific restriction, the other by its absence. That judgment in the first instance is for the legislative body. But in our system where the line can constitutionally be placed presents a question this Court cannot escape answering independently, whatever the legislative judgment, in the light of our constitutional tradition. And the answer, under that tradition, can be affirmative, to support an intrusion upon this domain, only if grave and impending public danger requires this.

Justice Rutledge’s opinion also noted that the right of assembly guarded “not solely religious or political” causes but also “secular causes,” great and small. As Aviam Soifer has suggested, Rutledge’s “dynamic, relational language” emphasized that the right of assembly was “broad enough to include private as well as public gatherings, economic as well as political subjects, and passionate opinions as well as factual statements.”

Soifer, Rutledge, Abernathy, and Brandeis gesture toward an important insight about group autonomy. Its primary value is not intimacy or expressivism—we have other rights, such as privacy and speech, that are better suited toward those ends. Rather, its primary value is that it permits dissent to manifest through groups. Justice Brennan glimpsed this value in Roberts when he noted that “collective effort on behalf of shared goals” is “especially important in preserving political and cultural diversity and in 278 323 U.S. 516 (1945).

---

279 Id. at 530.
280 Id. at 531–32 (internal citation omitted).
282 SOIFER, supra note 24, at 77–78; see also Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242, 258 (1937) (“The power of a state to abridge freedom of speech and of assembly is the exception rather than the rule . . . .”); De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U.S. 353, 364 (1937) (“[T]he right [of assembly] . . . cannot be denied without violating those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all civil and political institutions . . . .”); id. (“The right of peaceable assembly is a right cognate to those of free speech and free press and is equally fundamental . . . .”) shielding dissenting expression from suppression by the majority.\textsuperscript{283} This value of dissent entails risk because it strengthens a genuine pluralism against majoritarian demands for consensus.\textsuperscript{284} It resists what Nancy Rosenblum has called the liberal state’s “logic of congruence,” which requires “that the internal life and organization of associations mirror liberal democratic principles and practices.”\textsuperscript{285}

Dissenting practices often embody meaning different than that ascribed to them by outside observers, and “[m]any group expressions are only made intelligible by the practices that give them meaning.”\textsuperscript{286} Because “[c]hallenges to existing values and decisions to embody and express dissident values are precisely the choices and activities that cannot be properly evaluated by summations of existing preferences,” the right of assembly protects “activities that are unreasonable from the perspective of the existing order.”\textsuperscript{287} And a group need not lack privilege or status in \textsuperscript{283} Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609, 622 (1984); see also Boy Scouts of Am. v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640, 647–48 (2000) (finding that freedom of association is “crucial in preventing the majority from imposing its views on groups that would rather express other, perhaps unpopular, ideas” (footnote omitted)).

\textsuperscript{284} The importance of dissent was downplayed by the “liberal consensus” that formed the background to the initial recognition of the constitutional right of association in the middle of the twentieth century. Inazu, Strange Origins, supra note 16, at 541–42, 558 & n.558 (describing the prominence of mid-twentieth century liberalism that accompanied the Court’s initial framing of the constitutional right of association). In particular, pluralists like David Truman and Robert Dahl failed to recognize that “the capacity for groups to maintain autonomous practices, detached from and even antithetical to the will of the majority, was in some ways a destabilizing freedom. . . . [G]roup autonomy poses risk rather than stability for the democratic experiment.” Id. at 542–45, 555–57. For the contrast between the competing narratives of dissent and the pluralist consensus, see Sheldon S. Wolin, Democracy, Difference, and Re-Cognition, 21 Pol. Theory 464, 464 (1993), observing: From Roger Williams’s Bloody Tenent (1644) to John Calhoun’s Disquisition, Margaret Fuller’s Woman in the Nineteenth Century, Booker Washington’s Up from Slavery, and the Autobiography of Malcolm X, discursive representations of difference have appeared but until recently have had little effect on the main conceptual vocabulary or thematic structure of the theoretical literature of American politics. Instead, from Madison’s Tenth Federalist to the writings of Mary Follett, Charles Beard, Arthur Bentley, David Truman, and Robert Dahl, those modes of difference mostly disappeared or were reduced to the status of interests. The result: on one side, themes of separation, dismemberment, disunion, exploitation, exclusion, and revenge and, on the other, themes extolling American pluralism as the distinctive American political achievement and the main reason for the unrivaled stability of American society and its political system. To Wolin’s second list, we can add John Rawls, who became for Wolin the paradigmatic thinker of liberalism’s suppression of difference. See Sheldon S. Wolin, Politics and Vision: Continuity and Innovation in Western Political Thought 549 (2004) (noting that the “repressive elements in Rawls’s liberalism . . . reflect an aversion to social conflict that is in keeping with his elevation of stability, cooperation, and unity as the fundamental values”).

\textsuperscript{285} Rosenblum, Membership and Morals, supra note 5, at 36; see also William A. Galston, Liberal Pluralism: The Implications of Value Pluralism for Political Theory and Practice 3 (2002) (“Liberalism requires a robust though rebuttable presumption in favor of individuals and groups leading their lives as they see fit, within a broad range of legitimate variation, in accordance with their own understanding of what gives life meaning and value.”).

\textsuperscript{286} Inazu, Forgotten Freedom, supra note 15, at 567. See generally MacIntyre, supra note 267.

\textsuperscript{287} Baker, supra note 266, at 134.
society to assume an “unreasonable” or dissenting posture—dissent is defined by a group’s refusal to ascribe to state-enforced majoritarian norms in the particular setting in which it finds itself. Successful businessmen, non-practicing Jewish male college students, and Christian law students all play a part in “political and cultural diversity.” When the state seeks to inhibit or destroy their way of life, the groups that they inhabit become forms of “dissident expression.” We tolerate these forms of expression not because we endorse them or seek to emulate them, but because we recognize the state’s tendencies to dominate and control through the interpretations and meanings it assigns to a group’s activities.

Facilitating a space for meaningful dissent against suppression by majoritarian norms is also a fundamentally democratic goal. It protects not only Christian groups that oppose homosexual conduct but also gay groups that embrace and embody it. As Stephen Carter has argued, “[d]emocracy needs diversity because democracy advances through dissent, difference, and dialogue. The idea that the state should . . . create a set of meanings, [and] try to alter the structure of institutions that do not match it, is ultimately destructive of democracy because it destroys the differences that create the dialectic.” Beginning from a very different perspective, William Eskridge arrives at a similar conclusion: “The state must allow individual nomic communities to flourish or wither as they may, and the state cannot as a normal matter become the means for the 288 Cf. Healy v. James, 408 U.S. 169, 196 (1972) (Douglas, J., concurring) (“[T]he status quo of the college or university is the governing body (trustees or overseers), administrative officers, who include caretakers, and the police, and the faculty,” (emphasis added)).

290 Id.
291 See, e.g., Brief in Support of Petitioner, supra note 2, at 9 (“The genius of the First Amendment is that it knows no bias. Protections for one minority voice extend to all.”). One proponent of gay rights has critiqued the “overly formal, inconsequential, empty version of equality” that underlies the application of antidiscrimination law to the Christian Legal Society. See Joan W. Howarth, Religious Exercise, Expression, and Association in Schools, 42 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 889, 897 (2009).
292 Stephen L. Carter, Liberal Hegemony and Religious Resistance: An Essay on Legal Theory, in CHRISTIAN PERSPECTIVES ON LEGAL THOUGHT 25, 33 (Michael W. McConnell et al. eds., 2001). The importance of protecting difference and dissent is particularly relevant to the “counter-assimilationist” ideal of religious freedom that allows people “of different religious faiths to maintain their differences in the face of powerful pressures to conform.” Michael W. McConnell, Free Exercise Revisionism and the Smith Decision, 57 U. CHI. L. REV. 1109, 1139 (1990). In the context of religious freedom, and in contrast to his relatively unsympathetic treatment of the Jaycees throughout his Roberts opinion, Justice Brennan adopted a more communitarian approach. See, e.g., Corp. of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327, 342 (1987) (Brennan, J., concurring) ("For many individuals, religious activity derives meaning in large measure from participation in a larger religious community. Such a community represents an ongoing tradition of shared beliefs, an organic entity not reducible to a mere aggregation of individuals."); Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503, 524 (1986) (Brennan, J., dissenting) ("A critical function of the Religion Clauses of the First Amendment is to protect the rights of members of minority religions against [the] quiet erosion by majoritarian social institutions that dismiss minority beliefs and practices as unimportant, because unfamiliar.").
triumph of one community over all others.”

The call for greater group autonomy through the right of assembly is not without limiting principles. The text of the First Amendment offers one: assemblies must be peaceable. Our constitutional, social, and economic history suggests another: antidiscrimination norms should typically prevail when applied to commercial entities. Other questions are more difficult to answer. I take up some of them in my forthcoming book, Liberty’s Refuge.

Among the most difficult is whether the right of assembly tolerates racial discrimination by peaceable, noncommercial groups. Our constitutional history supports a plausible argument that “race is just different,” that the state’s interest in eliminating racial discrimination justifies a nearly total ban on racially segregated private groups.

As Justice Stewart in Jones v. Alfred H. Mayer Co.:

Congress has the power under the Thirteenth Amendment rationally to determine what are the badges and the incidents of slavery, and the authority to translate that determination into effective legislation. . . . [W]hen racial discrimination herds men into ghettos and makes their ability to buy property turn on the color of their skin, then it too is a relic of slavery.

For these reasons, we might plausibly treat race differently when considering the boundaries of group autonomy. I would be quick to do so as a matter of personal preference—I can think of no racially discriminatory group to which I attach personal value or worth. But treating race differently in all dimensions of the private sphere ultimately 294 See U.S. CONST. amend. I (“Congress shall make no law . . . abridging . . . the right of the people peaceably to assemble . . .”).

295 See, e.g., Brief for Petitioner, supra note 2, at 2 (“All noncommercial expressive associations, regardless of their beliefs, have a constitutionally protected right to control the content of their speech by excluding those who do not share their essential purposes and beliefs from voting and leadership roles,” (emphasis added)). Justice O’Connor proposed a similar line. See Roberts, 468 U.S. at 635–36 (O’Connor, J., concurring). As I suggested earlier in this Article, O’Connor’s requirement that an association be “predominantly engaged” in expressive activity introduces considerable difficulty to her conceptual categories, and her conclusion that the Jaycees itself was a commercial association is problematic. Id. at 635–37. For a clearer example of a commercial association, see City of Dallas v. Stanglin, 490 U.S. 19, 24–25 (1989), in which the Supreme Court denied the freedom of association claim of the owner of a skating rink who challenged a Dallas ordinance restricting admission to “dance halls” to people between the ages of fourteen and eighteen. As the Court noted, “[t]he hundreds of teenagers who congregate each night at this particular dance hall are not members of any organized association; they are patrons of the same business establishment.” Id. at 24.
297 Even here, however, very few people make categorical arguments—the Ku Klux Klan, for example, is still permitted to tout its racist message.
undercuts a vision of assembly that protects pluralism and dissent against state-enforced orthodoxy. We cannot move from the premise that genuine pluralism matters to an effort to rid ourselves of the groups that we don’t like.

On the other hand, the right of assembly will not always trump competing interests. Courts will have to draw lines and balance interests, just as they do with the freedom of speech. In my view, the protections for assembly ought to be constrained when a private group wields so much power in a given situation—as private groups did in the American South from the decades following the Civil War to the end of the Civil Rights Era—that it prevents other groups from meaningfully pursuing their own visions of pluralism and dissent.

Seen in this light, assembly is a self-limiting right. But as long as private groups do not tip the balance of power in this way, we should tolerate even those groups that offend our sensibilities.

Line drawing questions like the permissibility of race-based discrimination are immensely important. But these difficult questions should not prevent us from beginning to address the inadequacies of 299 The question of racial discrimination, and specifically discrimination by whites against African Americans, is one of the most difficult issues confronting any argument for greater group autonomy. My argument would permit some racially discriminatory groups. It is an argument rooted in social change and hope in social change—that we are a different society today than we were in 1960 and that we will continue to hold the ground that has been won. I do not mean to suggest that we have solved the problem of race. I do argue that in this, as in many other areas of the law, we recognize that the structural politics today are different. See, e.g., Nw. Austin Mun. Util. Dist. No. One v. Holder, 129 S. Ct. 2504, 2516 (2009) (“More than 40 years ago, this Court concluded that ‘exceptional conditions’ prevailing in certain parts of the country justified extraordinary legislation otherwise unfamiliar to our federal system. In part due to the success of that legislation, we are now a very different Nation. Whether conditions continue to justify such legislation is a difficult constitutional question we do not answer today.”) (citing South Carolina v. Katzenbach, 383 U.S. 301, 334 (1966)); Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306, 343 (2003) (“We expect that 25 years from now, the use of racial preferences will no longer be necessary to further the interest approved today.”); Freeman v. Pitts, 503 U.S. 467, 491–92 (1992) (“With the passage of time, the degree to which racial imbalances continue to represent vestiges of a constitutional violation may diminish . . .”); Wygant v. Jackson Bd. of Educ., 476 U.S. 267, 276 (1986) (plurality opinion) (“In the absence of particularized findings, a court could uphold remedies that are ageless in their reach into the past, and timeless in their ability to affect the future”); Green v. Ctvy. Sch. Bd. of New Kent Ctvy., Va., 391 U.S. 430, 435–38 (1968) (holding that a school district may be declared unitary and lacking racial discrimination based on satisfactory performance in five areas of a school district’s operations).

---

300 My proposal for assembly differs in this respect from what Andrew Koppelman and Tobias Wolff have called the “neolibertarian[]” position, which they attribute to an eclectic group of scholars that includes David Bernstein, Dale Carpenter, Richard Epstein, Michael McConnell, John McGinnis, Michael Paulsen, Nancy Rosenblum, and Seana Valentine Shiffrin. KOPPELMAN & WOLFF, supra note 6, at xii (quotation marks omitted).

301 A similar rationale underlies the free exercise of religion. A religious group that used its freedom to establish a theocracy would undermine the principles of the free exercise of religion. The relationship between the right of assembly and the religion clauses of the First Amendment is a yet unexplored dimension of constitutional law that might shed some light on the troubled jurisprudence surrounding “church-state” issues.
current doctrine. This Article has suggested that the current balance—or lack of balance—is deeply problematic. Our world is one in which courts have decided that fraternities cannot exclude women and Christian student groups cannot exclude those who do not share their religious convictions. The relevant question today is not whether a constitutional vision that offers strong protections for pluralism and dissent will be realized (as if this area of the law could ever reach finality), but whether we ought to move in that direction.

Some people will be unpersuaded by any constitutional vision that gives greater protections to dissenting groups, particularly one that limits the reach of antidiscrimination laws. They will push instead for greater congruence and less difference. That is the logic underlying the Court’s decision in Martinez. It surfaces in Justice Kennedy’s belief that a state-run public school “quite properly may conclude that allowing an oath or belief-affirming requirement, or an outside conduct requirement, could be divisive for student relations.”[^302] It is the fundamental tenet of the Ninth Circuit’s decision in Truth v. Kent that equates a Christian club’s desire to limit its members to Christians to invidious discrimination.[^303]

Those who endorse decisions like Martinez and Kent and reject a constitutional vision that challenges the current approach to protecting group autonomy need to provide a better justification for the categories of intimate and expressive association. They should articulate a convincing constitutional doctrine and ethos that legitimates the jurispathic silencing of “those who would make a nomos other than that of the state.”[^304] What Thomas Emerson observed almost fifty years ago remains true today: “[T]he constitutional source of ‘the right of association,’ the principles which underlie it, the extent of its reach, and the standards by which it is to be applied have never been clearly set forth.”[^305] The protections for group autonomy deserve greater respect—and a more coherent jurisprudential approach—than we have given them thus far.

VIII. Conclusion

This Article has called attention to flaws in the Supreme Court’s categories of intimate and expressive association. It is unlikely that these categories reflect “well-settled” doctrine.[^306] But even if they do, sometimes well-settled doctrine is wrong. The very real constitutional issues unfolding before us should not be answered by rote invocations of [^303]: Truth v. Kent Sch. Dist., 542 F.3d 634, 644–45 (9th Cir. 2008).

[^306]: KOPPELMAN & WOLFF, supra note 6, at xi.
these ill-formed categories.

The alternative constitutional vision of assembly is not without risk. It reintroduces a weighing of constitutional values that some would prefer remain suppressed. It strengthens protections for groups that you and I do not like. But it also strengthens protections for groups that we care about, against a state-enforced majoritarianism whose threat we might not recognize. As Justice Black once wrote: “I do not believe that it can be too often repeated that the freedoms of speech, press, petition and assembly guaranteed by the First Amendment must be accorded to the ideas we hate or sooner or later they will be denied to the ideas we cherish.”
