Reporting the proceedings of the National Academy of Arbitrators at its Twenty-first Annual Meeting in February, 1968, this book consists of a series of essays on arbitration, ranging from a comparison of British and American grievance procedure to an analysis of the use of tripartite boards in grievance arbitration.

Aimed primarily at the layman, this work discusses the advisability of settling all disputes short of litigation and analyzes the techniques available for forcing fair settlement. The author uses his own experience as executive vice-president of the American Arbitration Association to reveal arbitration techniques against a background of typical cases.

The author of this volume considers the jurisprudence of the great Chief Justice, John Marshall, by exploring the political and economic views that lay behind a great number of the Justice's famous opinions.

The author of this work examines the emphasis on collective bargaining in our national labor policy. He suggests that this policy creates our two key labor problems—major strikes, and the inflationary effects of contract settlements—and concludes that unless our emphasis changes, existing labor-management institutions will be threatened.

This thorough presentation of the successful effort to have Jack Ruby's murder conviction reversed by appellate courts, written by one of the defendant's chief counsel on appeal, purports to shed light both on the Kennedy assassination and the problems involved in administering justice to a man who commits a crime before millions of observers.

The second edition of this work, with a special preface considering new developments since the first edition appeared in 1965, contains chapters which discuss existing ombudsman systems, related institutions, and suggestions for proposed schemes in countries not yet utilizing the concept.
